Rumors of a Great Battle at Metz--Reorganization of the French Army--Marshal Bazaine Commander-in-Chief--A National War Committee.

LONDON, Aug. 8—Evening.—French dispatches today represent that actual hostilities are momentarily suspended; but a rumor prevails that the Prussian Armies have concentrated and a battle is raging before Metz.

PARIS, Aug. 8.—Le Temps, this evening, announces that Marshal BAZAINE has been appointed Commander-in-Chief, and Gen. TROCHU Major-General of the Army. Gen. LEBOEUF retires. Le Parlement says the Ministry have determined to create a National Committee, with power to act under all circumstances arising from the war.

The Reported Battle at Metz--Italy Rallies to the Aid of France.

PARIS, Aug. 8—Evening.—There has been no fighting today; but the French Army is concentrating, and a battle is expected hourly. Italy will send France 100,000 men.

Facts and Rumors in London--The Times on the Crisis--England as a Mediator--The Prussian Strength Today--Rejoicing in Germany on the Victory.

LONDON, Aug. 8.—The Times, this morning, says the French are in a critical position. It is a momentuous question whether the Emperor's health leaves him in possession of his ordinary faculties. The war is marked by his usual hesitation, to which is attributable the random and purposeless strategy, and the puzzling inaction which have probably brought calamity to the national arms. The Emperor is now bound to accept battle instantly, yet he has on hand the task of concentrating his forces and restoring esprit to a defeated army, and this while his enemy is concentrating in the heart of Lorraine. Circumstances will soon exact the reappearance of England in the character of a mediator. Forbach is among the strategic points gained by the Prussians in Saturday's battle, and now held by their forces. NAPOLEON telegraphed to Paris that the soldiers are full of courage, coolness and confidence, but the trial is a severe one and will require great sacrifices and efforts of patriotism to meet it. The Prussian forces menace Metz and St. Avold. MCMAHON continues to retreat toward Nancy. The Prussians claim that they will have 800,000 men on the theatre of war by this evening. There were illuminations and public rejoicings last night in Hamburg, Dresden, Breslau and other cities. The French prisoners are everywhere kindly treated.

PARIS, Aug. 8.—The Journal Officiel of Paris denies the loss of any cannon or eagles at Weissenburg. M. OLLIVIER last night announced to a mob in front of his official residence that the author of the false report of a victory on Saturday had been arrested and would be punished.

Prussian Accounts of the Recent Battles--A Bayonet Charge--Telegrams Received in Paris--French Officers Killed--Metz Preparing for Defense.

BERLIN, Aug. 8.—Gen. STEINMETZ telegraphs the following particulars of the contest between VON GOEBEN and the French forces under Gen. FROSSARD:

"The fight was opened on our side by the Fourteenth Division, which was subsequently reinforced by artillery and cavalry. A fierce and bloody struggle raged along the line between Saarbrück and Forbach, lasting until night. The height of Spicherelen was carried at the point of the bayonet, and the enemy thrown back on Forbach. Meanwhile our Fifteenth Division had advanced from Vocklingen, taken Rossel, and reached Forbach at nightfall, when the broken divisions of the French Army were being driven upon that point. Here the baggage and camp equipage of two divisions, and many prisoners were taken."

PARIS, Aug. 8.—The Journal Officiel contains the following dispatches:

METZ, Aug. 7--9½ A. M.—In the battle of Saarbrück Lieut Reischoffen MCMAHON'S Chief of Staff, Gen. COLSON, was shot by the Marshal's side. Gen. RAOUTT is among the missing. Our artillery suffered heavily. Marshal MCMAHON is now in communication with Gen. FAILLY. Metz is preparing for a vigorous defense. The General commanding the fortress has ordered Germans and strangers to provide themselves with a permission of residence.

Rejoicings Over the Prussian Victory--San Francisco Germans Jubilant--Meeting at Sharon Springs.

SAN FRANCISCO, Aug. 8.—The Germans of this city are wild over the war news from Europe. The Press dispatches were read in the theatres and German halls last night, and were received with enthusiasm. The streets and beer cellars are filled with people cheering and singing.

SHARON SPRINGS, N. Y., Aug. 8.—The joyful tidings of the German glorious victory over the French Army has been received here and the event celebrated with enthusiasm. Speeches were made by several New-Yorkers of distinction.

Position of the Opposing Forces--McMahon's Whereabouts--The English, German and French Press on the Present Crisis--France Thinks an Equilibrium of Power Desirable.

LONDON, Aug. 8.—A general battle in front of Metz is considered probable to-morrow. The Prussians are moving in that direction by forced marches. At last accounts Marshal MCMAHON was at St. Auverne. His corps suffered less than was at first supposed. The report that Gen. COLSON was killed by his side and that Gen. RAULT is missing is confirmed. The Pall Mall Gazette says the result of this battle means the triumph of the Prussians in the war. The German Press generally consider the French loss irretrievable. But there are three French corps which have not yet been under fire. The movement of retreat for the purpose of concentration has been effected, and a new line of defense taken up in the passages of the Vosges.

PARIS, Aug. 8.—The Journal says the relations of the Government of the Emperor with foreign Powers continue to be every where satisfactory, and it believes that late events, far from prejudicing this state of affairs, render more significant the fact that what the Governments desire in common with France is the maintenance of the European equilibrium.

Illness of Napoleon--The Orleans Princes--The Money Seizures in Paris--Blockade of the Elbe Ineffectual--Narrow Escape from Capture of a Prussian Iron-Clad--Fortifications of Frankfort.

LONDON, Aug. 8—4 P. M.—It is said privately that the Emperor is ill at Chalons, and that Drs. NELATON and PICORD have gone to attend him. His attack is a return of his old disease, provoked by equestrianism. The condition of Paris is believed to be dangerous. The Empress is in counsel with ROUHER and SCHNEIDER. It is said that the ORLEANS Princes are prodigal of their money in relieving the wounded of the French Army. The 14,000,000 of francs seized by the Police of Paris, last week, belonged to ROTHSCHILD, HIESCH, RAPHAEL, BISCHOFFSHEIM and other Jewish bankers. It is asserted that the seizure was suggested by the authorities of the Bank of France. Financial circles of Europe are much incensed at what is deemed a great outrage upon some of their number. Ships still enter the Elbe and Weser, notwithstanding the blockade. A French ram is cruising off Dover. Pleasure travel continues in Switzerland, despite the excitement the war occasions. The Prussian iron-clad Harmonia narrowly escaped capture by French cruisers recently off the mouth of the Elbe. Rumors of the purchase, by Prussia, of the Stevens Battery are discredited here. It is believed at Antwerp that the war will end in a week. The Figaro is filled with protests against the suppression of army correspondence. Mr. CRAMER, the agent of the Wolff Telegraphic Agency, barely escaped from a mob in the Rue Vivienne, seeking him in the belief that he was a Prussian spy.

FRANKFORT ON THE MAIN, Aug. 8.—The ports and harbors here are being rapidly armed with new 300-pounders.

The French Senate and Corps Legislatif to Meet Today--The Preparations for the Defense of Paris--Report of the Minister of War--France Strong to Cope with Her Enemies.

PARIS, Aug. 8.—The imperial decree has appeared convoking the Senate and Corps Legislatif to-morrow. A report of the Minister of War, approved by the Empress, is published in the official journal. The Minister says:

"Existing circumstances oblige us to provide for the defense of the capital, and to garrison it with fresh troops, allowing all those which the Emperor keeps under his orders to contend in the open country against an enemy emboldened by his first success to the point of marching on Paris. But Paris will not be taken unawares. The exterior forts received their armaments some time ago, and already we have commenced to arm the walls around the city. A state of siege has been declared, to facilitate the execution of certain works which will be commenced to-morrow. Thus the exterior forts are in a condition to sustain a regular siege, and in a few days the entire circuit of the walls will be found in a similar condition. Neither the strong arms nor the devotion of the inhabitants will be wanting for this task. The National Guard is to defend the ramparts which it will have helped to render unassailable. Forty thousand men taken from its ranks and added to the present garrison will be more than enough to make an active and vigorous defense against an enemy occupying an extended front. The defense of Paris, then, will be assured. But there is a point not less essential. It is the necessity of filling up the void in our army. With the help of the marine troops, with the regiments still at our disposal in France and Algeria, with the fourth battalion of each of our hundred regiments, including those members who belong to the Garde Mobile, and with a portion of our gensdarmerie, we may easily put into the field 150,000 men. Besides this, the call for the class of 1869 will give us 60,000 men, who, in a month, will become real soldiers. But for this struggle we can also employ the entire Nationale and Mobile Gardes, the companies of Franc-Tireurs, who are everywhere asking to be organized. Here we have 400,000 men, and finally, counting on the Garde Nationale Sedentaire, France can then arm two millions of defenders. Their arms are ready, and a million are still in reserve."

A decree has been issued ordering that the Garde Nationale of Paris be detailed for the defense of the capital and that the fortifications be placed in a condition to resist attack. A project of law will be presented to the Chambers incorporating in the Nationale and Mobile Guards citizens under thirty years of age who are not actually members.

LONDON, Aug. 8.—The defenses of Paris are officially reported as nearly ready to resist the heaviest assault, and it is said that 150,000 men are ready to fill up the ranks of the army in the field, and that the arming of all adults is contemplated.

France United--The Prince Imperial at Home--Precautions Against an Attack in Paris--General War Notes.

PARIS, Aug. 8.—The agitation here is very great, and the cry "To arms" is universal. The Empress is at the Tuileries, and will receive the Deputies there to-night. The Prince Imperial is now in Paris. The Chambers will reassemble immediately. The Garde Mobile is to join the regular army, and the fortifications of Paris are to be armed and defended by 30,000 men and the Paris National Guard, 100,000 strong. A levy en masse is looked for. The Ministry is in permanent session, organizing the defense of the country, and vigorous measures are announced for to-morrow. The proclamation of the Empress is applauded. The Departments of Vosges and Moselle are to be inundated by orders of the Government. Some of the Deputies of the Left met at the hall of the Corps Legislatif, to-day, and while they were there a great crowd surrounded the place shouting for arms. It is rumored that HENRI ROCHEFORT will be released. The people are assembled in great numbers on the Boulevards, and there is much agitation; but as yet there has been no disorder. The Americans here are receiving their passports.

Still Another Ministerial Proclamation--France Again Invoked to be United.

PARIS, Aug. 8.—The Ministers have issued the following proclamation:

FRENCHMEN: We have told the whole truth. It is for you now to do your duty. Let one shout come from all, from one end of France to the other! Let the people vie with each other in sustaining the great cause! Some of our regiments have fallen before overwhelming numbers. The army has not been defeated; sustain it. To the fortunate audacity of the moment let us oppose tenacity. Let the inhabitants of all parts of France not subjected to the burden of the war rush to the assistance of their brothers in the east. Let France be united. Heaven bless our arms!

Reply of Bismarck to Gen. Turr--Demands of Prussia from England--France and Prussia vs. Belgium.

LONDON, Aug. 8.—Count BISMARCK in a letter takes special pains to deny having encouraged the plans of Gen. TURR or others against Austria. He says: "TURR is not a person to be trusted with political confidences." The British Foreign Office has an imperative demand from Prussia that England shall stop shipment of coal to France or abandon the pretense of neutrality. The Globe says the Prussian Envoy insists on criminal proceedings against British pilots serving French war vessels. Trinity House refused the demand.

LONDON, Aug. 8.—A Brussels dispatch says the KING's speech from the throne confirms the statement that France and Prussia have given a written pledge to observe the neutrality of Belgium.

Rome Terrified--The Pope Claims Protection from Eugenie--The Feeling in Ireland.

LONDON, Aug. 8.—Advices from Rome state that the French disaster causes profound terror, and the Pope has asked EUGENIE for just one ship to defend him from the Italians, now organizing for an attack on the Papal dominions, and authority. Ireland receives the news of the French defeat with profound sorrow.

DUBLIN, Aug. 8.—Demonstrations in favor of France continue to be made by the people in the South of Ireland. At Tipperary, yesterday, a crowd singing the Marseillaise was dispersed by the Police.

The British Parliament--Security of Belgium Announced--England and the Exportation of Arms.

LONDON, Aug. 8.—In the House of Lords, today, Earl GRANVILLE stated that the neutrality of Belgium was now assured, the Powers now at war concurring in a pledge to respect it. He recited at great length the course of the negotiations undertaken by the British Government, and brought to this satisfactory result. Lord HALIFAX said the Government would not prohibit the exportation of arms. In the House of Commons to-night, no allusion was made to the war or kindred topics.

OPINION AT WASHINGTON.

Dispatches from Our Ministers in Europe, Italy, Austria and France--Future of Bonaparte and his Government--The French Fleet and Denmark.

Special Dispatch to the New-York Times.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 8.—There has been very little that is interesting here today, except the European war and war questions. The State Department dispatches from Mr. WASHBURNE show the urgency of the situation in Paris, but do not contain details beyond those already known to the public. The Department has not received anything in the last two days from Minister BANCROFT. Telegrams have been sent by our Legations in France and Prussia, but so far as can be ascertained they furnish no additional details. The Germans here are very much elated at the news and at the prospects, and there is some talk of a public demonstration, though no steps have been taken in that direction. The Prussian Legation is advised of liberal subscriptions in various cities of the country, particularly in the West, for the relief of the wounded and families of those killed. Subscription papers are open at numerous places in this city, and some of them bear many American signatures.

ATTITUDE OF ITALY AND AUSTRIA.

The report that Italy is coming to the aid of France is distrusted by various persons who sympathize with the French cause, and they think the arming of troops under VICTOR EMMANUEL is but the first step in a plan to seize Rome and overthrow the Pope. It is held by our officials that if there is a secret treaty between France and Italy it must come to light in a few days. The French sympathizers do not feel kindly toward Austria, and some of them strongly condemn the efforts by NAPOLEON'S Ministers to win over that Power. They say but one paper in Austria supports the French side, and profess to believe that Austrians will soon abandon the pretense of neutrality and declare openly for the Prussians. The French Minister, by order of his Government, formally asked the United States last week to issue a proclamation of neutrality, &c. Those in position to know something of the President's purposes think he will soon conclude to do so, though he said on Friday evening, just before he left here, that he had not yet determined what course to pursue.

A GENERAL EUROPEAN WAR.

It is believed by many that a general European war is imminent, and some few persons go so far as to say it cannot possibly be avoided. Pretty much everybody says the hints of disturbance yesterday in Paris are as significant as anything that came by the cable, and the declaration of putting the city under martial law is interpreted as meaning that revolution is among the near probabilities, if the most urgent measures are not adopted to prevent its outbreak.

NAPOLEON'S ABDICATION THOUGHT POSSIBLE.

Those in the circle having access to the French Legation seem to think that a mistake has been committed in calling together the Corps Legislatif. They say it can do no good, and the speeches of those who oppose NAPOLEON'S cause will excite the mob and be likely to produce disorder. The abdication of NAPOLEON is one of the things thought to be possible. Opinion is very much divided as to what may or will be done by the French fleet in the Baltic. Those who regard NAPOLEON as already about vanquished, say the fleet is of no consequence, and can do nothing to help him in his emergency. Some of the officials believe there is a friendly understanding, if not an actual treaty, between France and Denmark, and argue that the fleet will soon begin operations with Elsinore as a base, and use its guns and the 30,000 or 40,000 men it is reported to carry so as to give the Prussians a great deal of trouble.

ANXIETY TO GET THE NEWS.

The newspaper offices have been visited by many persons this evening, everybody seeming to be anxious to get more details of the fighting on Saturday and Sunday, and ascertain what has been done today. The Germans are out in force at all their places of resort, and the Prussian flag is displayed on the front of several houses.

DESPONDENCY OF THE FRENCH.

The French are quite despondent, the most intelligent saying it is not so much the loss of two or three battles that promises disaster, as it is the evident disintegration and demoralization of the people in and near Paris.

The Western Germans.

EVANSVILLE, Ind., Aug. 8.—The Germans held another meeting here, Saturday night, to express sympathy for Prussia in the present war. Collectors were ordered to go to work collecting.

Major Jerome Bonaparte--His Arrival in France--Possible Fortunes.

The Baltimore American says: "Major JEROME PATTERSON BONAPARTE arrived at Havre on Thursday in the steamer Lafayette from New-York, and will probably enter immediately upon field duty. He is at present Chief d'Escadron in a cavalry regiment, a rank between Captain and Major, and which has no corresponding position in our army. On the 15th of August he will be promoted to Lieutenant Colonel, at least such are the expectations, and will exchange into another regiment. In Algeria and in Italy he has served in almost every branch of the infantry and cavalry, and every step of his promotion has been won by soldierly gallantry. Many of the American newspapers are speculating upon the fame that he may achieve in the present war. According to the current reasoning, the Emperor cannot place himself actually at the head of the army on account of his physical sufferings; Prince NAPOLEON, or Plon Plon, showed himself in the Crimea and Italy to be careful to keep out of the range of bullets, and Prince PIERRE is in disgrace. Hence the soldiers will have among them a fighting BONAPARTE, who has been alienated by the rulers of the family, and who has the look and carriage of the first Emperor. If he distinguishes himself by some great and gallant action in the field, it is predicted that he will become the supreme favorite of the army."

Three tenement-houses in Orange, N. J., occupied by colored people, were set on fire yesterday morning by the stove of a baker who lives in one of the lower rooms. A colored boy was considerably burned before he could be rescued. As the members of the Fire Corps have resigned, the engines were run by small boys, which caused a little delay, but the fire was subdued before the building was entirely destroyed. The tenants vowed vengeance on the unlucky baker, and he made himself scarce.

DESCRIPTION OF METZ.

Metz is the centre of the triple range of fortresses with which the celebrated VAUBAN, the architect of LOUIS XIV., attempted to defend France against Germany from the north and the east. Round these frontiers he constructed no less than eighty-eight fortresses, of which Valenciennes in the north and Metz in the east are the strongest. As said before, Metz lies in the centre of the triple range, having as advanced post Thionville, and in the rear Nancy. The Moselle here is still very small, and scarcely practicable for small steamers, that go down with the current to Thionville, Sierck, Treves. At Coblentz it flows right through the city; one part of the river is still water. Metz is very irregularly built, has a population of about 80,000, and something like 23,000 men garrison. It is surrounded by three walls, forming two ditches, which are about eighty feet deep, and being connected with the river, may be inundated at five minutes' notice. On each side of the place is situated a kind of natural fort, called, on the right side of the river, the Fort Belle Croix, and on the left side the Mount St. Quentin. On the top of this latter, commanding a view of about twenty-five miles, is an optical telegraph, the signals of which may be seen from the Cathedral of Metz. The chevaux de frise, or fossés aux loups, consist in deep ditches, filled up with bayonets, swords, shells, grenades, &c., which are covered with the ground so carefully that the most practiced eye is scarcely able to detect them. All the buildings outside the place are wooden frame-work, so that they can be destroyed at a moment's warning. The Fort Belle Croix (20) is completely undermined, and the mines are connected with the Arsenal (13), so that they can be blown up from this latter place. The "Porte des Allemands" is a historically curious place, and the only remainder of the old fortress as it had been constructed by the Dukes of Lorraine. This gate was assaulted, in 1545, by CHARLES V., Emperor of Germany and King of Spain, but the Emperor, victorious on all other points, was defeated on this by his eternal enemy, FRANCIS I. of France. It is not to be expected that the Prussians will carry this fortress as easily as they seem to have carried the little but strong place of Bitsche, and the experience of the Prussian Generals will scarcely allow them to leave so strong a place in their rear, so a decisive battle may be looked for in the plain surrounding Metz.

THE GREAT VICTORY.

Rejoicings of the Germans Over the War News--Hope of a United Country the Cause of their Enthusiasm.

The European war news of yesterday and day before yesterday announcing the victories of the German over the French arms, created the greatest rejoicings among the Germans of this City. The merits and valor of the troops from the different parts of Germany engaged in the fights were joyfully discussed. LOUIS NAPOLEON had, of course, received anything but praise at the hands of our German fellow-citizens. They say that the war was wantonly forced upon the German people by him, and had not the slightest foundation in justice or right as far as LOUIS NAPOLEON and France were concerned. They say it was intended again to take away from Germany one of the finest positions of her territory—that west of the Rhine—and to force the people there to give up their mother tongue, in their native land, and to adopt the French. The same, they say, had been done with the now French departments of Alsace and Lorraine, which had belonged in former times to and been part of Germany, but had been conquered and kept by France. No nation or people of civilization or self-respect would submit to such demands and such attacks. The enthusiasm of the Germans manifested itself yesterday, chiefly in throwing flags, American as well as German, to the breeze, and by gathering at the usual resorts in this City. It is believed that if France would have to pay for all the wine and beer which is drank by the Germans of this City and country in their manifestations of love to fatherland, the French war debt, originating in the present war, would be increased considerably. The New-Yorker Stants Zeitung, of yesterday, says about the rejoicings among the Germans of this City over the German victories in Europe: "Our Anglo-American fellow-citizens wonder at, and many are also glad of, our great national enthusiasm, but only the smallest number of them understand the true motives of it. But we Germans know and feel that from this giant struggle our old fatherland will proceed as a great, united, respect-demanding power of the earth. This idea is what fills the hearts of the remotest German settlers in the primitive woods, in the wildernesses of Arizona and Nevada, on the Pacific as well as on the Atlantic ocean, with infinite enthusiasm. This idea it is that, like a new breath of life, pervades us Germans in America, and strengthens our self-respect."

The news of the Prussian victories has been received with great enthusiasm among the Germans of Newark, N. J. The Executive Committee of the War Club of the City will meet today to make arrangements for a grand mass-meeting to be held in view of the recent victories, and to make any arrangements which may seem proper toward furnishing the needed supplies to the widows, the orphans, and the wounded soldiers. It is expected that the proposed mass-meeting will excel anything of the kind yet held in Newark.

Imposing ceremonies were conducted last night at ASCHENBACH'S Hall, College Point, by the German citizens of that place, on the occasion of a public flag-raising to celebrate the victory of the Prussians over the French on Saturday. The meeting was enthusiastic in the extreme. Patriotic addresses and songs occupied the audience inside the hall; free lager, fire-works, and general hilarity outside. The younger portion of the village went nearly wild in the general rejoicing.

The Germans Turners Jubilant--Gymnastics the Cause of the Victory.

The hall of the German Turnverein, in Orchard-street, was decorated with American and German flags all day yesterday in celebration of the victories of the German Army. In the evening the hall was very handsomely illuminated, and some fire-works were displayed in front of the building. Within the hall a goodly number of Turners had assembled, and were addressed by Mr. S. SEWARDS. He stated that the valor manifested by the German soldiers in the present war was due to the circumstance that they all were Turners. Military gymnastics were introduced a number of years ago into the Prussian and afterward into the North German Army. At Berlin a central military gymnasium has been established where the military officers are instructed in gymnastics, and they instruct the soldiers at the different garrisons, each of which has a military gymnasium. The speaker stated that for this reason the German Turners had especial occasion for rejoicing over the late triumph of the German soldiers. He then spoke of the political history of Germany for several centuries past, and declared that the present war would result in the political union of Germany. Mr. H. MOESINGER recited a poem, written by him for the occasion, and the Turners' Singing Society sung the German national air, "The Guard on the Rhine," (Die Wacht am Rhein.) Toasts were offered to German unity, to the German people, to the German arms and to All-Germany. (the German part of Austria included.) Great enthusiasm prevailed among the Turners throughout the evening.

A German Patriotic Aid Society Organized in the Fourteenth Ward.

A meeting was held by the Germans of the Fourteenth Ward at No. 9 Spring-street, last evening, for the purpose of organizing a German Aid Society. The following permanent officers of the Society were elected: Messrs. H. PETERS, President; A. SCHLUETTER, Vice-President; G. STRAUB, Treasurer; FR. GULLMANN, Secretary. Mr. PETERS was also elected a delegate of the Society to the General Committee of the German Patriotic Aid Society of this City. It was resolved that the officers of the Society appoint a number of collectors in the Ward to receive subscriptions and report them at a future meeting. Several subscriptions were made on the spot, and Messrs. S. STERN, E. VOGEL, and A. WOLTZ delivered patriotic addresses. The meeting then adjourned.

IRELAND.

Recent Demonstrations in Favor of France--The "Nationalists" Hesitate.

A Cork dispatch of the 24th ult. says: "A demonstration of sympathy with France was made in the Park today. About 5,000 persons, chiefly artisans, attended, with four bands and banners. A tri colored flag was hoisted amid great cheers. At the commencement of the proceedings Mr. JOSEPH RONAYNE, a Nationalist, took the chair, and stated that the demonstration was intended to show that the Times newspaper had not represented the feeling of Ireland as regards France. Ireland and France were old allies, and the best blood of Ireland had been shed in the French service. France had not done all she ought for Ireland. They had a fleet once in Bantry Bay, but it was withdrawn, and the army which assembled in Boulogne was sent to Russia. These were two great mistakes. Mr. RONAYNE proceeded to discuss the chances of England engaging in war against France, and said if she did she would soon become a mere tradition. Speeches were also made by Ex-Mayor O'SULLIVAN and others, and resolutions repudiating the Times as an exponent of such feeling, and expressing sympathy with France, were passed. Repeated cheers were given for France and Ireland, and references to MCMAHON evoked great enthusiasm. After the meeting a procession was formed, and went through the city with the tri-color in front. No policemen were visible throughout the proceedings."

A Dublin dispatch of the same date says: "Another demonstration to express sympathy with France took place at Sandymount, near Dublin, today. About 20,000 persons, all of the lower class, assembled, with upward of fifteen bands, the men being dressed in green, and carrying tricolor, American and green flags. One of the last bore the inscription, 'God save Ireland.' A person named BYRNE, who stated he was the representative Frenchman resident in Dublin, read an address, and presented a new drum to the St. Thomas Band, in place of one broken by the Police on the occasion of the former demonstration. The address only bore two signatures, including BYRNE'S own. No French person appeared on the ground. BYRNE was introduced by the Secretary of the Amnesty Association. After the presentation, the bands played Irish and French national airs, and the people cheered loudly, waving hats and green boughs. There were no speeches delivered, and the assembly promenaded about two hours, the bands playing incessantly. A similar demonstration was held at Harold's Cross, but was a comparative failure, about 2,000 persons being present. Four bands played. The proceedings collapsed in half an hour. The bands of both assemblies marched home in procession, playing. The Police did not interfere.

The Appropriations--An Explanatory Circular.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 8.—The following circular was today promulgated:

THE INDIANS.

Omahas Off Hunting--Economy of the Indians--Abstinence from Animal Food.

WASHINGTON, Aug. 8.—Friend JANNEY writes, under date of the 5th inst., inclosing a report of Agent PAINTER, of the Omaha Agency, which states that the Omahas have gladly availed themselves of the liberty granted them by Gen. AUGUR to go on the Summer hunt, being much in want of skins for moccasins, and without money to buy shoes for the Winter. They were very hungry for meat, having been almost without animal food for nearly a year. This abstinence is from motives of economy, as they have not and will not encroach on their small annuity to buy beef, but prefer to let go what they can spare to pay for building their houses and improving their lands. All the Indians were in good health at the time they went off on the hunt.

MURDERERS TRACED.

The War Department has information that at the Cheyenne Agency, above Fort Sully, D. T. there are now four Indians who committed, two years ago, the murder of a soldier belonging to the garrison at Fort Randall, and stealing, at the same time four Government mules. The Indian Agent at that point says his Indians can point the murderers out, and that the facts are well known to him. Referring to the above communication, the Secretary of War has directed that the Indians be arrested and given to the Court at Yanckton for trial.

OFFICERS AS INDIAN AGENTS.

The following letter from the Acting Commissioner of Indian Affairs to Col. DE L. FLOYD JONES, Superintendent of Indian Affairs at Idaho Territory, contains a decision of the Secretary of the Interior on the subject of officers of the army performing the functions of a civil office under the new army law.

OFFICE OF INDIAN AFFAIRS,
WASHINGTON, Aug. 8, 1870.

SIR: Your letter of the 26th ult. asking to be relieved from Indian duty, should it be decided that army officers on the active list are forbidden by the recent act of Congress making appropriations for the army to hold or perform the functions of any civil office, was received and referred to the Secretary of the Interior. The Secretary, by a letter of the 5th inst., says: "I have to inform you, in reply, that no construction of the act of Congress, to which reference is made, necessitates the immediate removal of officers from the civil service, inasmuch as time must of necessity be given to the Department to select proper persons to fill their places. You can inform Col. JONES that he has nothing to apprehend as to his standing in the army, from the delay incident to a judicious change of officers; but that he will be released from his present duties as soon as a suitable successor can be found.

Very respectfully your obedient servant,
WM. F. CADY, Acting Commissioner.

THE NATHAN MYSTERY.

Continuation of the Coroner's Inquest.

Complete Report of the Second Day's Proceedings.

Important Evidence Established—A Theory Regarding the Overturned Chair—What Dr. Peckham and His Wife Heard on the Night of the Tragedy—The Newsboy's Story—Testimony of Gen. Frank P. Blair and Others.

Yesterday morning Coroner ROLLINS resumed the inquest in the Nathan case, conducting the proceedings, as on the first day, in the Court-room corner of Seventh-avenue and Twenty-second-street. It is needless to say that hundreds thronged to the place, eager to catch a glimpse of the parties interested as well as to hear the testimony to be elicited. Of these curious ones but few were admitted, however, owing to the disagreeable fact that the Court-room is unsafe, the floors being entirely without pillars to support them. Why Court is held there at any time when human life is thus jeopardized is an unaccountable circumstance, but with that the present inquest had nothing to do, and hence it may be left with the proper authorities to decide. No more were admitted than could be accommodated with seats, and those who could not get inside were content, many of them, to stand upon the sidewalk four long hours, under a broiling sun, simply that they might see the faces of those at whom some of the viler newspapers have pointed, in this connection, the finger of suspicion. Several ladies were in attendance, watching the developments of the case with the most eager attention. The Messrs. NATHAN, accompanied by Mr. EMANUEL B. HART, occupied seats within the railing, and were evidently objects of intense curiosity—all eyes being turned toward them, especially when questions were asked relating particularly to them. One old man, who struggled hard for a position favorable to a good view of the "boys," said that he had "walked five miles to see these fellows under fire, and he was bound he'd see it through." The NATHANS were attired in deep mourning, and wore the same expression of grief as was manifested on the former occasion. The Coroner was accompanied by his deputy, Dr. BEACH, and also by Mr. Assistant District-Attorney FELLOWS, the last-named gentleman conducting the examination in the main. The jurors are, without exception, highly intelligent men, and far above the average of Coroners' jurymen. They render valuable assistance in drawing out some of the most important points of testimony. This is particularly true of the foreman and the second juror, both of whom are gentlemen of keen, judicial minds, eminently gifted for the present work. Not a point is left untouched, unless it be a trivial one; indeed, sometimes the witness is permitted to enter into the most minute details of matters wholly irrelevant to the case. The door is opened very widely in this investigation, in order that the whole truth may be reached, and even theories are asked for, with the hope of gaining some light upon the dreadful mystery.

Seven witnesses were examined yesterday, once of whom, Officer MANGAN, was called on the first day. Neither of the Messrs. NATHAN were placed upon the stand, which circumstance greatly disappointed those who came particularly to hear their stories. The names of fresh witnesses were Drs. JANVRIN and RUPPANER, of the Fifth-avenue Hotel, Dr. PECKHAM, a neighbor of the NATHANS, Gen. FRANK P. BLAIR, Mr. WASHINGTON MACKENZIE, a carpenter and builder, who frequently did work for the deceased, and a newsboy, who serves persons in that locality with the morning dailies. No new testimony was brought to light, but many wild stories, the pure fabrications of crazy men's brains, were scattered to the winds, while many essential points of the case thus far presented in these columns were fully established. The evidence made it almost absolutely certain that the murderer or murderers belonged outside of the family, and that he or they did leave the house after concluding the bloody work.

SUMMARY OF THE TESTIMONY.

Drs. JANVRIN and RUPPANER testified as to the nature of the wounds found upon the body of the murdered man, and each gave his views of how the deed was done. Both agreed that there was a deep incised wound on the top of the forehead, and three or four contused wounds on the back of the head, all of which could have been given by the one instrument, the "dog." They believed that he had been dead since about 2 o'clock in the morning. Dr. JANVRIN thought that the hand was broken while raised to protect the head, after the first blow. After comparing the bloody weapon with the wounds, the doctor laid the "dog" down by the side of the victim's head, which fact fully answers a sensational journalist's question as to how it came to be in that spot when the Coroner arrived. Dr. JANVRIN thought the whole thing done by one man, and he not necessarily a man of superior strength. The other doctor thought it possible that two men were present, but believed, with his associate, that one man could have accomplished all. Both physicians believed that there was little, if any, struggle between the murderer and his victim, as the latter was stunned by the first blow on the forehead. The gas was turned about one-third on in Mr. NATHAN'S room when Dr. JANVRIN went there at 6 o'clock in the morning. It was sufficiently light, he thought, to enable one to see to strike his blows accurately, if his eyes had become accustomed, for a few minutes, to the room. It was agreed by the medical gentlemen that a chemical or microscopical examination of the garment worn by Mr. FREDERICK NATHAN would instantly reveal whether the blood strains thereon were of coagulated or fresh blood. It seemed probable to one of the doctors that Mr. NATHAN, being alarmed by the work at the safe, arose, and, going toward the little room in which it was located, was met by the murderer, who dealt him a driving blow on the forehead with the sharp end of the "dog." This stunned Mr. NATHAN, and he fell forward with his head into the overturned chair that lay near the safe, some of the blood and hair adhering to the bottom of the cushion at the points of contact. While he was lying thus, the other blows were given on the back and side of the skull, as it was favorably exposed to the strokes. He then either struggled and regained his feet and staggered into the other room, or else was lifted and thrown back by his assailant. He possibly struggled to get up again from the last position, and in doing so besmeared the wainscoting with hand and knee, and perhaps while thus raising up had his hand broken. This would account, it was thought, for the pools of blood found in the safe-room.

Gen. FRANK P. BLAIR testified that on the morning of the murder, about half an hour before he heard the Police called, he saw Mr. FREDERICK NATHAN in his bed-room, apparently cooling himself by the window. He was then very calm in his demeanor, and was evidently putting on his drawers and stockings. There was then not a spot of blood on his night-gown, front or back. The hall door was then open, he was positive, at an angle of about forty-five degrees. Both of the NATHANS cried frantically for help when on the stoop, and the General's impression was that a burglary had been committed; was absolutely certain that the individual who had blood on his night-gown, when on the stoop, was the same one who was at the window half an hour or so before. He saw no newsboy on the street at that time, or during the morning.

Mr. MACKENZIE testified to the fact that the "dog" was not an implement used by house-carpenters or builders, and that, although he had done work in Mr. NATHAN'S stable and house, he had never before seen the "dog" anywhere, until it was shown to him by the Superintendent of Police. Both of the carpenters, LE MAISTRE and SMITH, employed by him at Mr. NATHAN'S, were men of very good character, as far as he knew.

Officer MANGAN being recalled, still adhered, with great emphasis,—of course he did—to his former statement that, at 1½ and 4½ A.M., he tried the door of the house, and at 5¾ o'clock, looked at it from the sidewalk, and that each time it was closed. He saw no newsboy in the neighborhood, and no piece of paper on the stoop when trying the door. Neither of these, he declared, could have escaped his keen observation.

With Dr. PECKHAM'S story, as given in the TIMES of Sunday last, to one of our reporters, our readers are already familiar. It will be remembered that the doctor and his wife occupy the house corner of Fifth-avenue and Twenty-third-street, the rear windows of which are about fifteen or twenty feet distant from the side windows of the Nathan mansion. The doctor's bed-chamber is directly opposite and on a level with the windows of the floor on which Mr. NATHAN slept on the night in question. Being very light sleepers, accustomed to wakefulness, the doctor and his wife were aroused at about 2 o'clock in the morning by noises which the wife thought were within their house, but which evidently came from the domicile of their neighbor. There were four of them,—the first like the violent shutting of a heavy door, and the others at quarter-minute intervals, sharper and of shorter duration. The first sound might have been made by striking the chair with a "dog." Witness couldn't fix the time precisely, but judges that it was about 2 o'clock, because he had enjoyed a refreshing sleep after the storm subsided. Mrs. PECKHAM arose and looked out, but nothing was seen, and nothing more was heard. The bolts of Mr. NATHAN'S house draw very easily, and everything under foot being very solidly built, it would be easy to walk out of the house without being heard. Nobody passed from NATHAN'S house toward Fifth-avenue, on either side of the way, or witness and his wife would have heard them distinctly, as it was very quiet in the street; could not have heard a person walking toward Sixth-avenue, if he walked carefully.

The last witness of the day was JAMES NEIS, a newsboy, thirteen years of age, whose testimony has also been foreshadowed in these columns. He swore that on the morning of the murder, at about five or ten minutes past 5 o'clock he went to Mr. NATHAN'S stoop, as usual, to fold his papers, as there were better accommodations there than elsewhere; that finding the stoop wet, he went across the street and did the work. Soon afterward he saw a laboring man, whose dress he described, go up the stoop of Mr. NATHAN'S house, and following him, observed that he picked up a bank check, filled out in ink, bearing a revenue stamp on its face, and after glancing at it put it in his pocket and walked toward Sixth-avenue. The hall door was then open a distance of about two inches. Ten minutes or so before cries of murder were heard he saw an open private carriage before Mr. NATHAN'S house, but it was soon driven away at the instance of a man who came out of the next house below and spoke to the driver. Shortly afterward the NATHANS alarmed the street with their cries, but nearly ten minutes elapsed before an officer responded to their calls. Meanwhile a crowd gathered upon the stoop, some of the men being laborers, apparently. To one of these persons the boy saw Mr. NATHAN—which of the two brothers he could not say—hand the "dog," and heard them speaking of it. Witness did not see an officer anywhere in the vicinity that morning, until some time after the alarm. He knew the paper picked up was a check, because he had worked in a printer's where such things were printed. The above is a fair outline of the best points of the testimony, which is given in full below.

The hour of 2 having arrived the Coroner proposed an adjournmeat, being assured by the reporters, he said, that the testimony already taken would be all that could possibly be written out and printed on the morrow, and deeming it very important that the public should hear all of the story, he felt warranted in pausing for a brief time. For his own convenience or comfort he cared nothing, he said, his only desire being to hurry the investigation on to a close, and to exhaust it as speedily as possible. The District-Attorney, Mr. FELLOWS, and the jurymen also expressed anxiety to hasten the investigation, but were willing to give way to the suggestion of the Coroner, if it seemed to be absolutely necessary.

After some further discussion, the inquest was adjourned until 10 o'clock this morning, when it will take place in the Court of General Sessions room, in Chambers-street. The change is made not only on account of the dangerous condition of the other room, but also because of the superior accommodations of the latter.

The Second Day's Proceedings Before the Coroner's Jury—Testimony of Seven Witnesses—Drs. Janvrin, Ruppaner and Peckham, Gen. Frank P. Blair, Washington McKenzie, Officer Mangan and James Nies Examined—Adjournment Until Today.

The following is a complete report of the testimony of yesterday before the Coroner's jury, as taken by our most accomplished reporters:

Dr. JOSEPH E. JANVRIN testified, in reply to the Coroner, as follows:

Q.—Where do you reside? A.—Fifth-avenue Hotel.

Q.—On the morning of the 29th of July, were you sent for to the residence of Mr. NATHAN in Twenty-third-street? A.—Yes, Sir.

Q.—What hour? A.—About five minutes past six o'clock; I was sent for twice; first, by the porter of the hotel, who told me that Mr. NATHAN had been murdered, and secondly, by Mr. LYON, nephew of Mr. NATHAN, who said he was still breathing; I arrived there immediately afterward; I discovered the body of the deceased in the large room in which he slept, with the feet and ankles in the small room; he was lying on his back, with his left leg contracted, the knee resting against the door; I did not notice the position of the arms; I think the right hand lay near the right side, and the left lay across the abdomen.

Q.—Did you examine the wounds? A.—Yes, Sir; there were four very severe wounds—two on the right prominence of the frontal bone, one cutting through the skin down to the bone in the centre of the head, and the other crushing the bone above the back part of the ear; I judge that blow was given from behind, the sharp portion penetrating the skin and the shaft breaking the bone; at that time the temporal artery was cut by the blow, I think; there was also one severe wound on the back of the head, just on the occipital prominence; the wound near the ear must have been given with dreadful force, which lacerated the ear just in the centre and scratching down the side of the neck; there were three or four other wounds of a slight nature, which I suppose were given afterward; I judge they were given after Mr. NATHAN was on the floor, and while the person was at the back of him, right over his head; the metacarpal bones of the right hand were fractured, which, I think, was given while endeavoring to protect his head.

Q.—Did you see the instrument called a "dog?" A.—Yes; it was brought up by a policeman while I was in the room.

Q.—Do you think that instrument produced those wounds? A.—I think so, every one; I examined the instrument and held it over the two wounds at the right side of the frontal prominence and found it filled them; the end which inflicted the blows was covered with blood, and the shaft of the instrument corresponded exactly with the wounds.

A JUROR—Do you think this instrument caused all these wounds? A.—Yes.

To the Coroner—As far as I could judge the wounds were fully an inch in length; even if the instrument was not more than three-quarters of an inch it might have been given by that instrument, because it would necessarily slip a little, especially where it did not penetrate the skull.

Q.—In your opinion, how long was he dead before you came in? A.—I should judge three or four hours, or even a little longer than that.

Mr. RUSSELL.—Have you made surgery a special study? A.—I have studied it for a considerable period; I served three years in the army, and have practiced surgery for the last ten years.

Q.—In the examination you made with a view of discovering the kind of instrument by which these wounds were inflicted, did you expect to be called upon here? A.—Yes.

Q.—And you gave a careful examination accordingly? A.—Yes.

Q.—And from comparison you think the same instrument inflicted all these wounds? A.—I feel confident every blow was inflicted by that one instrument.

FOREMAN.—When you entered the house whom did you see? A.—The person who let me in was a policeman.

Q.—Did you see any person on the first parlor floor except that policeman? A.—Yes; Mr. FREDERICK NATHAN.

Q.—Did you see Mr. WASHINGTON NATHAN before you got into the room? A.—I saw him afterward in the rear room on the floor.

Q.—Did you observe the clothing of these two gentlemen? A.—No, Sir.

Q.—You did not notice whether there was any blood on the person of either of these gentlemen? A.—They were both dressed at this time.

Q.—Did you observe whether there was a carpet loosely lying on the floor of the hall, or whether the marble tiling was uncovered? A.—I did not notice, as the place was rather dark.

Q.—Did you look for marks of blood upon the hall or door? A.—I did not see any marks of blood either on the hall or street-way; I saw no marks of blood except in the rooms.

Q.—When the "dog" was brought up by the policeman to the room in which Mr. NATHAN was lying where was it placed? A.—I think it was lying between Mr. NATHAN'S head and the window.

Q.—Did you examine the dog with a view of ascertaining whether the blood upon it was recent or old? A.—Yes, Sir.

Q.—What was the result? A.—Thoroughly dry.

Q.—Thoroughly dry? A.—In about an hour's time; probably more but not less.

Q.—Did you observe the other end of the dog? A.—I did, Sir.

Q.—Was it perfectly clean from blood? A.—I think it was.

Q.—The hand of a person grasping that instrument would not necessarily be bloody? A.—No, Sir; my opinion is that with the exception of the blow on the front part of the head, all the blows were given when the party who gave them was standing at the rear of Mr. NATHAN, or when he was on the floor; all these wounds could have been given without a drop of blood getting upon the murderer.

Q.—What is your theory in relation to the relative positions of the murdered and murderer? A.—I supposed there was but one man; that Mr. NATHAN was awakened by the noise in the room where the safe was, and when he got up to enter the room he was probably met by the party, who struck him in the front part of the skull; I presume it knocked him over on his back; possibly it did not; I think the murderer passed over him into the back room, and while he was lying there inflicted the other blows from behind.

Q.—Did you observe the chair that had fallen in the study? A.—When I saw it it was standing up; one of the policemen tipped it forward and said it was found in that position.

Q.—At the time you entered the chair was standing in the natural position? A.—Yes.

Q.—Did you notice the bottom of the chair? A.—I looked at it and saw a very little blood upon it; I saw the blood between the chair and the library.

Q.—How, then, do you account for the presence of blood in the study and the blood found in various positions? A.—That was the only point which confused me at all; it is hard to account for the blood in these positions. It cannot be accounted for under my theory, except the temporal artery was cut in the first blow and the rush of blood was spattered in these directions.

Mr. RUSSELL.—When you went into the room was there gas-light burning? A.—Yes.

Q.—You cannot say whether the hand of Mr. NATHAN was extended or not? A.—My impression is that it was lying down the right side.

Q.—Did it appear to be drawn up as if shielding the head from blows? A.—The hand was lying across the chest; whether it was placed there by some one I can't say; I examined it and found a slight mark where the skin was broken.

Q.—How is it you suggest it was extended by the side? A.—My impression is that some one moved the hand and placed it on the chest.

FOREMAN—Was there any circumstance to indicate that there was more than one murderer? A.—No, Sir.

Q.—Was there anything to imply that the murderer was a person of unusual strength? A.—No, Sir.

Q.—You passed through the rooms on the floor in which Mr. NATHAN slept; did you notice the number of doors you passed through? A.—Not particularly.

Q.—Did you see the clothing on the deceased? A.—I saw it lying on the chair directly in front of the body; I did not inspect it, but I noticed, however, one or two spots of blood on the shirt-front.

Q.—Was the safe open at the time you were in the study? A.—Yes, Sir; but I think the key was not in it at the time; I saw no blood upon any of the papers lying around.

CORONER—Did you notice whether his eyes were black, and whether there was an incised wound in his thumb? A.—I did not notice the wound in his thumb, but his eyes were black from the effects of the injuries he received.

Q.—Would you recognize the dog (dog produced.) A.—I am of the opinion that is the instrument.

FOREMAN—From your opinion of the murder, do you think there was a struggle? A.—I don't think there was any struggle whatever; I think Mr. NATHAN was stunned at the first blow; there were some marks at the side of the door, which I presume were made by Mr. NATHAN'S right hand; he evidently tried to get up, and got hold of the door casement.

Q.—You think then that he received such a blow as prevented him from giving any alarm? A.—I think so.

Mr. FELLOWS—Please state precisely what was the position of the gas-light toward the window? A.—The gas-light was at the window next the little room in the large room on the side next Fifth-avenue; I think the shutter was partially back so as to shut off the glare of the light from the place where Mr. NATHAN himself was lying; it was turned about one-third; I don't think it could be seen from the street, neither could the position of the light be seen.

A JUROR—Was there sufficient light in the room to enable the murderer to give his blows with correctness? A.—Yes; especially if he were there a few minutes before and was accustomed to the light

DR. ANTHONY RUPPENER'S TESTIMONY.

Dr. ANTHONY RUPPENER, who resides in the Fifth-avenue Hotel, testified:

Q.—On the morning of the 29th of July were you called to see Mr. NATHAN, in Twenty-third-street? A.—Yes; about a quarter to eight o'clock.

Q.—When you arrived there what did you discover? A.—I was admitted into the hall by Mr. WASHINGTON NATHAN, and immediately went up the front stairs where Mr. NATHAN was lying; the body was lying about ten inches from the door leading into the small room with the face toward the room; the legs were drawn up and the right hand was up toward the head and the left toward the shoulder; the head was a little turned to the right; on the right frontal bone I found a fracture, extending toward the ear, and was lacerated; there was a number of wounds on the back of the head, one on the occiput and the others down; I felt that it was not right to disturb the position of the body, and I did not touch the head at all; I examined the frontal bone with this dog and found it fitted.

Q.—In your opinion is that the instrument ("dog" produced) which inflicted those wounds? A.—Yes.

Mr. FELLOWS—You spoke of this incised wound across the forehead—would that "dog" have inflicted it? A.—Yes; the sharp end would.

Q.—Where was this "dog" placed. A.—It was left directly behind the head, on the floor.

Q.—In the blood? A.—Yes.

Q.—Did you examine the instrument with any care? A.—I did.

Q.—And I suppose there was fresh blood upon it? A.—There was.

Q.—Did you examine to see if this blood had not been there three or four hours? A.—There was no blood on the instrument caused by its being left behind the head of the deceased.

Q.—Did you see Mrs. KELLY or her son that morning? A.—No, Sir.

Q.—Who of the inmates of the house did you see? A.—WASHINGTON NATHAN and the officers.

Q.—Was Mr. NATHAN dressed at the time? A.—He had only shirt, pants and slippers on.

Q.—Did you examine the clothing of BENJAMIN NATHAN? A.—No.

Q.—You understood everything in the room remained in the position it was when discovered? A.—I did not ask that.

Q.—From what you saw of the position of the body, the marks of blood and disarrangement of papers, &c., what do you think as to whether there was a struggle or not? A.—It strikes me there was a struggle.

Q.—Could not these symptoms have been produced by death agonies if there was no physical struggle? A.—I imagine death must have ensued very soon by a blow from that instrument.

Q.—If a person received a sudden blow which subsequently caused death, might not the hands have clenched as you found them? A.—Possibly.

Q.—Would it be probable? Would you say a struggle had gone on between Mr. NATHAN and his murderer? A.—I should be inclined to that opinion.

Q.—How long do you aver the body dead? A.—Probably four or five hours.

Q.—Your impression is that death must have ensued immediately after the infliction of the wounds? A.—Yes.

FOREMAN—Was the blood on the floor so thoroughly dried as not to soil the clothes of a person touching it? A.—Yes.

Q.—There could be no mistaking the stains upon the night clothing produced by fresh blood, and produced by blood that had coagulated by a person having been killed there hours previously? A.—I should be unwilling to answer that question without a chemical analysis.

Q.—Presumably it could be ascertained by microscopic observation? A.—That would help it.

Q.—Would it require unusual physical strength to inflict those wounds? A.—I don't think it would; I am satisfied that one blow from such a weapon would be sufficient to kill a gentleman like Mr. NATHAN.

Q.—From your best judgment what is your impression as to the possibility of there being a protracted struggle? A.—The blow might have stunned him, but it is difficult to tell whether he could have been able to get up and struggle; the position of his limbs indicated that, in addition to the blood which I saw upon the walls.

Q.—Could he have continued the struggle without calling for help? A.—To some extent, but I think he could not struggle much.

Q.—In view of all you saw, do you adopt the theory of the last witness as to the order of the struggle and the manner in which the murder was committed? A.—I adopt the statement so far that Mr. NATHAN was struck as he approached the room, but I should not be willing to give as my opinion that there must not have been more than one murderer.

Q.—What is there to render you of opinion that there was more than one? A.—From the general appearance of the body it strikes me there was a pretty severe struggle there.

Q.—How many of the wounds would have occasioned death in the absence of the others? A.—I think the one on the frontal bone would be sufficient.

Q.—You think, therefore, the person had no knowledge of the amount of violence necessary to cause death? A.—I don't think he had.

Q.—From the wounds at the back of the head, do you think there was more than one person, or that he merely reversed his position? A.—There was nothing in that to imply that there was more than one murderer, but from all the circumstances I am inclined to believe that there was more than one person engaged in it.

Q.—Would the murderer have marks upon him necessarily? A.—I think he would have marks upon him; he would inevitably have blood upon him; I think, also, he would have scratches or marks if there was a contest.

Q.—In the absence of a contest, upon the theory that he was felled by the first blow, you think he would not have necessarily borne on his person scars or bruises? A.—Yes.

Q.—How do you explain that a person who had been engaged in this conflict, and whose hands were in the condition that a person's must have been, could have placed the drawer of the safe on the bed without any blood getting on the bed or the drawer? A.—I could hardly account for it.

Q.—Would that involve washing or wiping of the hands, as an intermediate process, in your judgment? A.—I should think the murderer would have to wash his hands.

Q.—In a general way, from your observation of everything at the time, was it your opinion that the robbery had been committed previous or subsequent to the murder; I mean by that, do you think the articles were stolen from the clothing first, that the attempt was made upon the safe next, and that Mr. NATHAN was then murdered; or do you think that the articles were stolen from the clothing first, that Mr. NATHAN was then murdered, and these articles abstracted from the safe after the murder? A.—My impression was this: that somebody went in there to rob that safe, and was probably detected; Mr. NATHAN heard the noise, got out of bed, went into the little room, was met by the robber, and was struck; the position of the body would indicate that that was the order of proceeding.

Q.—You then, agree with Dr. JAUVRIN in his theory? A.—Yes, Sir.

By Mr. RUSSELL—Have you a theory that there were two persons? A.—I have no theory in regard to the matter; but, as I stated, I should not be willing to swear whether there were one or two persons.

By the FOREMAN—How do you account for the appearance of blood on the lintels each side of the door; there was blood to about an equal height? A—I account for it, on one side at least, by the, that the artery was cut; secondly, if Mr. NATHAN made any struggle to get up, he would hold on to the side of the walls, and perhaps the walls became besmeared in that way; in another way, if he had any struggle with the murderer, he would have been thrown into the corner, and the blood caused in that way.

By Mr. RUSSELL—Was there anything in the appearance of the body when you saw it to indicate that it had been placed there or drawn there by any person; or that it was the natural fall of the body receiving the blow? A.—It seems to me it was a natural position; it strikes me it would have been difficult to place it in that position exactly.

By Mr. FELLOWS—Did you examine the position of the chair in the small room when you entered. A.—I didn't examine it; I merely noticed the chair was lying in that way. [A chair was here placed on the floor bottom up with the forward part of the seat and the top of the back resting on the floor.] A.—I have an impression that the chair was lying so.

By Mr. RUSSELL—He said the chair was upright when he came in at five or ten minutes past six, so that undoubtedly it had been taken up.

By Mr. FELLOWS—That was a sofa-bottomed chair: did you examine the top and bottom of the cushion? A.—No, Sir; I walked into the little room; saw the sofa, table and the chair as I said.

Q.—Then you don't know that the only blood that was on that chair was on the bottom of the cushion. A.—No, Sir.

Q.—Referring to your theory of the manner of Mr. NATHAN'S entering that room, the safe being here, close by that chair, and Mr. NATHAN entering from his room, if the blow was struck him, as he entered, on the forehead, would it have been possible for him to have fallen so that his head would have come on the bottom of the chair in that position? A.—I should think not.

Q.—Now in regard to the sprinkling of blood which are indications of a quarrel, will you please state whether, accepting your theory that the hands of the assassin must have been covered with blood, if he was struck might not the spatters been caused by his hands as he threw them back. A.—Some blood might but I don't think the flow of blood would be so immediate.

Q.—Were there any arteries cut? A.—I stated that he artery had been cut.

Q.—The blood would, therefore, have come out with a great deal of force? A.—Yes, Sir.

By the CORONER.—Is it not your opinion that a person coming in contact with the walls would cause those marks? A.—If the hand of the murderer came in contact with the wall, the marks would be spread in different appearances, different forms, while from an artery it would be splashed.

By the FOREMAN.—The chair was found in this position; that is to say, the head of the chair was facing near west; suppose the murderer had struck Mr. NATHAN with the instrument in the forehead, might he not have fallen forward with his head into this chair, and then struggled up from that position, the chair having been overturned in the conflict, of course? A.—I should be unwilling to—

Q.—Supposing the chair was in this position, how do you account for Mr. NATHAN'S head coming in contact with the chair this way, and afterward his being found in the position in which he was lying at the time his body was first discovered? A.—Accepting your statement, I should think that in that case Mr. NATHAN had been struck first on the back of his head from behind; then tumbled forward into the room, his head struck this chair; that afterward he struggled away from it himself and received an additional blow on his head.

By Mr. FELLOWS—Then, according to your statement, if the blow was struck on the back of his head, which knocked him forward, so that his head could have rested in that chair, the murderer or murderers must have turned him round, because his head was found lying in the opposite direction? A.—Yes, Sir; he had been struck, and fell on his back.

By Mr. RUSSELL—What do you say to this; that the person who assailed him was in the smaller room; that he struck him a blow as he came in; that in the act of raising, the assassin seized the chair and struck him on the back of the head. Wouldn't that account for it without a change of the body or theory as to whether the blow was from behind or before? A.—If you get such a blow where do you get your blow from?

DR. JANVRIN RECALLED.

Dr. JANVRIN being recalled said that when he saw the body he found the right leg perfectly extended, the foot and the ankle in the little room; the left leg was relaxed; I don't recollect the exact position of the arms; I remember, however, that the right hand lay, at one time, across the breast.

Q.—What was the general appearance of Mr. NATHAN when you examined him? A.—When I examined him everything was perfectly flaccid.

Q.—When was that. A.—Ten minutes after six; it seems that the stiffness did ensue after that; I went into the house afterward at a quarter past ten o'clock, simply to give my ideas to one of the detectives.

Q.—Did you examine the body then? A.—No, Sir; I cannot say whether it was stiff at that time or not; when the instrument was brought up into the hall I examined the point of it and found the blood upon it was perfectly cold and coagulated at that time; I inserted that into the fractured portion of the skull, and by that means some fresh blood was got upon the instrument, and the blood was just about two-thirds of the distance of the handle more upon one side than the other; quite a little clot gathered there.

Q.—Was the blood fully coagulated. A.—Yes, Sir; it must have taken at least an hour, and it might have been four.

By Mr. FELLOWS—From what you saw of the character of the wounds and the condition of the body, how long had Mr. NATHAN been dead? A.—Certainly three hours, possibly four or five.

Q.—The murder might have been committed at 1 or 2 o'clock? A.—Yes, Sir.

Q.—Did you find but one blow on the back of his head? A.—No, Sir; I simply turned his head up and felt beneath it for the wound.

Q.—Did you see any bloody tracks in the hall or on the steps? A.—No, Sir; I didn't examine at all.

Q.—(By the CORONER)—Who was in the hall when you arrived there? A.—I could not tell; there was one gentleman there whom I could tell if I saw him; I saw him afterward, I think, later in the day at the Fifth-avenue Hotel, and spoke to him.

Q.—Did you see FREDERICK NATHAN? A.—I saw him below some ten minutes later; I saw WASHINGTON NATHAN with the Captain of Police.

Q.—Were the boys both dressed at that time? A.—Yes, Sir.

By the FOREMAN—You coincide with the opinion of Dr. RUTENER that by microscopic examination probably, and chemical analysis certainly, coagulated blood upon a garment can be distinguished from fresh blood. A.—Yes, Sir.

By Mr. FELLOWS—Did you make any microscopical examination of the body or blood then? A.—No, Sir.

Q.—Did you notice whether there was any considerable quantity of hair scattered about in the blood? A.—I noticed none whatever.

Q.—Any indications that hair had been pulled out violently? A.—No, Sir.

Q.—Then your opinion is—— A.—As I said before, that he was stunned at first, and no violence was used.

By a JUROR—How could that wall have become so besmeared? A.—That would not necessarily imply that he made any struggle.

Q.—Do you think the blood came from Mr. NATHAN? A.—I do.

Q.—It was rubbed on there either by a shirt or limb. A.—Yes, Sir; in both cases, I think, by Mr. NATHAN himself; I think part of it was caused by Mr. NATHAN'S knee, as he rubbed it against there, perhaps, in the agonies of death; I think Mr. NATHAN tried to get up; I think there is evidence of that much struggle, and in trying to get up he caught hold of the right casement of the door; the blood was almost all on the right; that was on the door of the casement and upon the wall between the door and window; my impression is that he never got above the sitting position after he fell; I think he may have done that; that was, in my judgment, when he recovered from the first wound.

Q.—How, then, do you suppose he got from the small room out there? A.—I think he was knocked out.

Q.—How do you explain the blood upon the overturned chair? A.—That's what I cannot explain,

Q.—This blood, as I understand you, was in the narrow space in the large room, between the jam of the door and the window? A.—Yes, Sir.

Q.—Was there anything in the appearance of the blood when you first saw it to indicate that it might not have been produced by rubbing the hands against it? A.—I think it was produced by the hands.

Q.—Then if the murderer rubbed the blood off of his hand upon the wall it would leave the impression you saw there? A.—Yes, Sir. I don't think he did that, however. I think Mr. NATHAN did it after his hand was fractured, grabbing at the door. I have no idea that there was any great physical strength on the part of Mr. NATHAN at all. In fact, I am very well convinced that there was not.

By the FOREMAN—Don't you think the right hand of the murderer grasping that instrument would thereby have been protected from having much blood on the inside of the hand? A.—Yes, Sir.

Q.—You found no blood at all on the end of the instrument which the person held in his hand? A.—No, Sir.

Q.—Don't you think it would have been difficult for blood to get in upon the hand? A.—I think the deed might have been committed by one man and he get free without a single drop upon him.

Q.—You don't mean to say he could have got off without having blood spattered upon him? A.—Yes, Sir; I don't say there could not have been more than one man in the room; I think the deed was done by one man; that the first blow was struck from the front, knocking him down; that he probably jumped right over him.

Q.—How about the papers being handled? A.—I think they probably were, because I think in all probability he had no blood upon him; if he was careful to step over the blood on the floor he could prevent getting any blood on his feet.

Q.—Did you notice the door communication between the study and the hall, when you went there the first time? A.—I noticed that it was shut; I didn't notice whether it was locked.

Q.—You think then that Mr. NATHAN may have been murdered without attracting the attention of passers-by, or making any outcry? A.—I think he made no outcry whatever.

Q.—And that this person might have commenced, continued, and completed the examination of the safe without getting any blood upon himself? A.—That is just my opinion, and the opinion I formed at the time; at the same time, of course, I think there may have been two persons in the room; I only mean to say that there only need to have been one.

TESTIMONY OF GEN. FRANK P. BLAIR.

Gen. FRANK BLAIR was next called, and deposed:

Q.—Where do you reside? A.—In St. Louis.

Q.—Were you in the City on the night of the 28th of July? A.—Yes, Sir; I was at the Fifth-avenue Hotel, where I am boarding.

Q.—On the morning of the 29th of July was there anything that attracted your attention? A.—What fell under my observation I will proceed to narrate as it occurred.

Q.—State first about the time it was. A.—About half past five, or probably a little before, in the morning; I got up for the purpose of closing the blinds of my room in which the light was coming very strongly, and which, in fact, had awakened me, and in doing so, as I approached the window and looked across the street I saw in the house, No. 12, a gentleman sitting in his night clothes at the third-story window, and I noticed at the same time that the front door of the house was open; stood at an angle of about forty-five degrees; of course, this didn't arrest my attention particularly, at least didn't excite any wonder in me at seeing the door open, and the gentleman sitting in his own house at his window, as I supposed; I retired to bed after closing the blinds, and was aroused a short time afterward by outcries of "Police!" and "Murder!" and I got up and saw two gentlemen in their night-clothes standing at the door of No. 12, both exclaiming loudly and calling for help, and one of them had a stain of blood upon his garments and his feet were bloody—his stockings; and I saw the policeman enter the house, remain in it a short time, and I saw one of these young men pick up this iron instrument that lay near the door and show it to the policeman, and I supposed, from the distance I was from it, that it was the bolt of the door that had been, as I judged, broken off or detached in opening the door; I supposed at the time that there had been some attempt to enter the house; I remembered that I had seen the door wide open, and I thought the person who had entered the house had been detected, and in attempting to detain him that this young man had been injured, and the outcry had been made by these young persons, they not being able to go into the street, as they were undressed; that was the impression the scene made upon my mind; they continued to cry out in such a frantic manner, to exhibit so much grief and distress, that I concluded my idea was incorrect, and I dispatched a servant over there to learn what there was about it, and I learned that Mr. NATHAN had been murdered; that is about all that fell under my observation at that time in reference to this matter.

By Mr. RUSSELL—At which window was it you saw the young man sitting? A.—The third-story window, immediately over the front door, nearest to Sixth-avenue.

Q.—Who was that young man; have you seen him since? A.—Only afterward at the door; he had side whiskers on his face.

Q.—Look across the room and see if you recognize him there. A.—Yes, Sir; (pointing to FREDERICK NATHAN.)

Q.—Which was it that had the blood upon his clothes. A.—The same one.

Q.—So you saw FREDERICK NATHAN at the window, and afterward at the front door? A.—It was the same person.

Q.—How did he appear? A.—His demeanor was entirely natural at the time—undisturbed and unexcited; it seemed to me that he was putting on his stockings.

Q.—At the time you saw them both on the stoop you then remembered you had seen the door open, and you connected that with the fact that the door was opened when you looked out before? A.—Yes, Sir; the theory that suggested itself to my mind at that time was that, having seen the door open at the time I saw this young gentleman at the window, it occurred to me that some one had entered the house by the open door, and that the young man had detected it and attempted to arrest him.

By the CORONER—Was this young man the same one you saw at the window, and the one that had blood on his shirt? Yes, Sir.

By Mr. RUSSELL—Did you notice whether there was a light on the second floor. A.—No, Sir; it was day light when I looked out.

By Mr. FELLOWS—Which floor do you occupy in the Fifth-avenue Hotel? A.—Fifth floor; No. 73.

Q.—Is that of a height with the third floor of the Nathan house? A.—Very nearly; the latter might be a little higher than mine; I wont be certain.

Q.—When your attention was called to FREDERICK NATHAN, was he sitting or standing at the window. A.—Part of the time he was sitting, and he would get up from his chair and go to the rear of his room, and appeared to me to be getting some garment to dress himself with; I didn't remain a great while; the morning was a very sultry one; I tried to cool myself at the window.

Q.—Did you see him at any time standing with his front directly toward you? A.—Yes, Sir; I saw him distinctly; he came to the window, and leaned out of it slightly, apparently for the purpose of cooling himself.

Q.—You saw the whole length of his person when he was in the room? A.—No, Sir; I could not.

Q.—There might have been blood on the lower garment and you not have discovered it? A.—Yes, Sir.

Q.—When you saw him at the door what part of his night-shirt was bloody? A.—His stockings, the lower part of his shirt, and his shirt-front.

Q.—You are positive that blood was not on him when you saw him before. A.—Yes, Sir; I am quite positive about that.

Q.—What time was this? A.—I don't know exactly; it was some time before the alarm was given.

Q.—Had you gotten to sleep or in a doze? A.—I think very likely I was partially asleep.

Q.—At the time you first looked out of the window did you see a newsboy on that side of the street; any boys with papers? A.—No, Sir.

Q.—Anybody on the steps of the Nathan House? A.—No, Sir.

Q.—Were there persons passing? A.—I think there were, but I wouldn't be positive.

Q.—When the two young men came down, and gave the alarm, did you notice the position of the door at that time as they were standing in it? A.—The same side of the door appeared to be open; I think the other remained in the same position; they were outside of the door; appeared in great distress.

Q.—Was the door thrown any wider open than it was when you first saw it at half past five? A.—I could not tell; my attention was more attracted to the young men; occasionally I could hear what they said when they raised their voices very loud.

Q.—Can you recognize the second of the two persons you saw that morning? A.—Yes, Sir; I think the second one sits by the window with the fan.

Q.—Was there any blood upon his garments when you saw him? A.—I didn't see any.

Q.—Was you in such a position that you could? A.—Yes; he took almost every position that a man would under such circumstances; both were dressed in white night-sh trict Republican Association. If any man had gained access to that society who was not a true-hearted Republican, they wanted him ousted at once. It was their desire that none but Republicans of the right stripe and calibre should be among them. A resolution was finally passed that each one of the Association present should take the printed list of the members, comprising about 980 names, look it over, and mark all who were doubtful Republicans. The report is to be made at the next meeting, on the second Monday of September.

FRANCE AND PRUSSIA.

Origin of the Difficulty—Both Powers were Determined to Fight—Prussia Ready for War.

The correspondence between the British Government and its diplomatic representatives at Paris, Berlin and St. Petersburg, has just been published. It throws a great deal of light on the causes which led to the war, and the temper of the two Powers, and consequently possesses considerable historical interest. We give the most important passages.

Lord LYONS, British Ambassador at Paris, writes to the Foreign Secretary as follows, under date Paris, July 8, 1870:

"On my manifesting some surprise and regret at the rapid pace at which the French Government seemed to be proceeding, M. DE GRAMMONT insisted that it was impossible for them to delay any longer. They had reason to know (indeed the Spanish Ministers did not deny it) that the King of Prussia had been cognizant of the negotiation between Marshal PRIM and the Prince of HOHENZOLLERN throughout. It was, therefore, incumbent upon His Majesty, if he desired to show friendship toward France, to prohibit formally the acceptance of the Crown by a Prince of his House. Silence or an evasive answer would be equivalent to a refusal. It could not be said that the quarrel was of France's seeking. On the contrary, from the battle of Sadowa up to this incident, France had shown a patience, a moderation, and a conciliatory spirit which had, in the opinion of a vast number of Frenchmen, been carried much too far. Now, when all was tranquil, and the irritation caused by the aggrandizement of Prussia was gradually subsiding, the Prussians, in defiance of the feelings and of the interests of France, endeavored to establish one of their Princes beyond the Pyrenees. This aggression it was impossible for France to put up with. It was earnestly to be hoped that the King would efface the impression it had made by openly forbidding the Prince to go to Spain.

A voluntary renunciation on the part of the Prince would, M. DE GRAMMONT thought, be a most fortunate solution of difficult and intricate questions; and he begged Her Majesty's Government to use all their influence to bring it about."

On the 10th July, Lord LYONS had another interview with the French Minister, and the Duc DE GRAMMONT then said:

"That in this matter the French Ministers were following, not leading, the nation. Public opinion would not admit of their doing less than they had done.

As regarded military preparations common prudence required that they should not be behindhand. In the midst of a profound calm, when the French Cabinet and Chambers were employed in reducing their military budget, Prussia exploded upon them this mine which she had prepared in secret. It was necessary that France should be at least as forward as Prussia in military preparations.

Finally, M. DE GRAMMONT told me that I might report to your Lordship that if the Prince of HOHENZOLLERN should now, on the advice of the King of Prussia, withdraw his acceptance of the Crown, the whole affair would be at an end.

M. DE GRAMMONT did not, however, conceal from me that if, on the other hand, the Prince, after his conference with the King, persisted in coming forward as a candidate for the throne of Spain, France would forthwith declare war against Prussia."

On the 12th the Duke DE GRAMMONT had a further conversation with Lord LYONS, which is thus reported by the latter:

The Duke said that the King of Prussia was neither courteous nor satisfactory. His Majesty disclaimed all connection with the offer of the crown of Spain to the Prince LEOPOLD of Hohenzollern, and declined to advise the Prince to withdraw his acceptance. On the other hand, Prince LEOPOLD's father had formally announced in the name of his son that the acceptance was withdrawn. In fact, the Prince had sent a copy of a telegram which he had dispatched to Marshal PRIM, declaring that his son's candidature was at an end.

M. DE GRAMMONT said that this state of things was very embarrassing to the French Government. On the one hand public opinion was so much excited in France that it was doubtful whether the Ministry would not be overthrown if it went down to the Chamber to-morrow and announced that it regarded the affair as finished without having obtained some more complete satisfaction from Prussia. On the other hand, the accumulation of the crown of Spain by Prince LEOPOLD put an end to the original cause of the dispute. The most satisfactory part of the affair was, M. DE GRAMMONT said, that Spain was, at all events, now quite clear of the dispute. The quarrel, if quarrel there was, was confined to France and Prussia.

I did not conceal from M. DE GRAMMONT my surprise and regret that the French Government should hesitate for the moment to accept the renunciation of the Prince as a settlement of the affair. I reminded him pointedly of the assurance which he had formally authorized me to give to Her Majesty's Government, that if the Prince withdrew his candidature the affair would be at an end. I urged as strongly as I could all the reasons which would render a withdrawal on his part from his entrance painful and disquieting to Her Majesty's Government. I pointed out, moreover, that the renunciation wholly changed the position of France. If war occurred now, all Europe would say it was the fault of France; that France rushed into it without any substantial cause—merely from pride and resentment. One of the advantages of the former position of France was that the quarrel rested on a cause in which the feelings of Germany were very little concerned, and German interests not at all. Now Prussia might well expect to rally all Germany to resist an attack which could be attributed to no other motives than ill-will and jealousy on the part of France, and a passionate desire to humiliate her neighbor. In fact, I said France would have public opinion throughout the world against her, and her antagonist would have all the advantage of being manifestly forced into the war in self-defense to repel attack. If there should at the first moment be some disappointment felt here in the Chamber and in the country, I could not but think that the Ministry would in a very short time stand better with both if it contented itself with the diplomatic triumph it had achieved, and abstained from plunging the country into war, for which there was certainly no avowable motive.

Lord GRANVILLE, in reply to the renunciation is not accepted as a settlement of the question, and denies that Her Majesty's Government has admitted, as M. DE GRAMMONT had implied in the Corps Legislatif, the demands of France to be legitimate. The next day M. DE GRAMMONT is urged "in the most friendly, and, at the same time, most pressing manner, to accept the renunciation of the Prince as a satisfactory settlement." Lord LYONS, in a personal interview with M. DE GRAMMONT, inquires upon what terms the French Government will consider the matter finally settled:

"M. DE GRAMMONT said he would explain to me in a few words the position taken up by the Government of the Emperor.

The Spanish Ambassador had formally announced to him that the candidature of Prince LEOPOLD had been withdrawn. This put an end to all question with Spain. Spain was no longer a party concerned. But from Prussia France had obtained nothing, literally nothing.

M. DE GRAMMONT here read to me a telegram from Gen. FLEURY, who stated that the Emperor ALEXANDER had written to the King of Prussia to beg him to order the Prince of HOHENZOLLERN to withdraw his acceptance of the crown, and had, moreover, expressed himself in most friendly terms to France, and manifested a most earnest desire to avert a war.

The King of Prussia had, M. DE GRAMMONT went on to say, refused to comply with this request from his Imperial nephew. The King had not given a word of explanation to France.

His Majesty had, he repeated, done nothing, absolutely nothing. France would not take offense at this. She would not call upon His Majesty to make her any amends. The King had authorized the Prince of HOHENZOLLERN to accept the crown of Spain; all that France now asked was that His Majesty would forbid the Prince to alter at any future time his decision to withdraw that acceptance. Surely it was but reasonable that France should take some precautions against a repetition of what had occurred when Prince LEOPOLD's brother went off to Buchorest. It was not to be supposed that France would run the risk of Prince LEOPOLD suddenly presenting himself in Spain, and appealing to the chivalry of the Spanish people. Still France did not call upon Prussia to prevent the Prince's going to Spain; all she desired was that the King should forbid him to change his present resolution to withdraw his candidature. If His Majesty would do this the whole affair would be absolutely and entirely at an end.

I asked him whether he authorized me categorically to state to Her Majesty's Government, in the name of the Government of the Emperor, that in this case the whole affair would be completely over.

He said 'Undoubtedly;' and he took a sheet of paper and wrote the following memorandum, which he placed in my hands:

'Nous demandons au Roi de Prusse de défendre au Prince de HOHENZOLLERN de revenir sur sa résolution. S'il le fait tout l'incident est terminé.'

I observed to M. de GRAMMONT that I could hardly conceive that the French Government could really apprehend that after all that had occurred Prince LEOPOLD would again offer himself as a candidate, or be accepted by the Spanish Government if he did.

M. DE GRAMMONT said that he was bound to take precautions against such an occurrence, and that if the King refused to issue the simple prohibition which was proposed, France could only suppose that designs hostile to her were entertained, and must take her measures accordingly.

Finally M. DE GRAMMONT asked me whether France could count upon the good offices of England to help her in obtaining from the King this prohibition.

I said that nothing could exceed the desire of Her Majesty's Government to effect a reconciliation between France and Prussia, but that, of course, I could not take upon myself to answer offhand, without reference to Her Majesty's Government, a specific question of this kind."

On the 14th the British Government recommended the King of Prussia to communicate to France his consent to Prince Leopold's renunciation. The suggestion is declined:

"Count BERNSTORFF called upon me this morning and informed me that he had received a telegram from Count BISMARCK, in which he expressed his regret that Her Majesty's Government should have made a proposal which it would be impossible for him to recommend to the King for his Majesty's acceptance.

Prussia had shown, under a public menace from France, a calmness and moderation which render any further concession on her part equivalent to a submission to the arbitrary will of France, and would be viewed in the light of a humiliation, which the national feeling throughout Germany would certainly repudiate as a fresh insult.

Public opinion in Germany proves that, under the influence of the menaces of France, the whole of Germany had arrived at the conclusion that war, even under the most difficult circumstances, would be preferable to the submission of the King to the unjustifiable demands of France.

The Prussian Government, as such, has nothing to do with the acceptance of the candidature of Prince LEOPOLD of Hohenzollern, and had, not even been cognizant of it. They could not therefore, balance their assent to such accept ance by their assent to its withdrawal.

A demand for interference on the part of a Sovereign in a matter of purely private character could not, his Excellency considered, be made the subject of public communication between Governments, and, as the original pretext for such a demand was to be found in the candidature itself, it could no longer be necessary now that the candidature had been renounced."

Before this the following conversation had been held:

LORD A. LOFTUS, (BRITISH MINISTER AT BERLIN,)
TO EARL GRANVILLE.
[Received July 15.]

BERLIN, July 13, 1870.

I had an interview with Count BISMARCK today, and congratulated his Excellency on the apparent solution of the impending crisis by the spontaneous renunciation of the Prince of HOHENZOLLERN.

His Excellency appeared somewhat doubtful as to whether this solution would prove a settlement of the difference with France. He told me that the extreme moderation evinced by the King of Prussia under the menacing tone of the French Government, and the courteous reception by His Majesty of Count BENEDETTI, at Ems, after the severe language held to Prussia, both officially and in the French Press, was producing throughout Prussia general indignation.

He had that morning, he said, received telegrams from Bremen, Königsberg, and other places, expressing strong disapprobation of the conciliatory course pursued by the King of Prussia at Ems, and requiring that the honor of the country should not be sacrificed.

Count BISMARCK then expressed a wish that Her Majesty's Government should take some opportunity, possibly by a declaration in Parliament, of expressing their satisfaction at the solution of the Spanish difficulty by the spontaneous act of Prince LEOPOLD, and of bearing public testimony to the calm and wise moderation of the King of Prussia, his Government, and of the public Press.

His Excellency adverted to the declaration made by M. DE GRAMMONT to the Corps Legislatif, "that the Powers of Europe had recognized the just grounds of France in the demand addressed to the Prussian Government;" and he was therefore anxious that some public testimony should be given that the Powers who had used their "bons offices" to urge on the Prussian Government a renunciation by Prince LEOPOLD, should likewise express their appreciation of this mild and conciliatory disposition manifested by the King of Prussia.

Count BISMARCK then observed that intelligence had been received from Paris (though not officially from Baron WERTHER) that the solution of the Spanish difficulty would not suffice to content the French Government, and that other claims would be advanced. If such be the case, said his Excellency, it was evident that the question of the succession to the Spanish throne was but a mere pretext, and that the real object of France was to seek a revenge for Königsratz.

The feeling of the German nation, said His Excellency, was that they were fully equal to cope with France, and they were as confident as the French might be of military success. The feeling, therefore, in Prussia and in Germany was that they should accept no humiliation or insult from France, and that if unjustly provoked they should accept the combat.

But, said his Excellency, we do not wish for war, and we have proved, and shall continue to prove, our peaceful disposition; at the same time, we cannot allow the French to have the start of us as regards armaments. "We have," said His Excellency, "positive information that military preparations have been made, and are making, in France for war. Large stores of munition are being concentrated, large purchases of hay and other materials necessary for a campaign are making, and horses are being collected." If these continued, said His Excellency, we shall be obliged to ask the French Government for explanations as to their object and meaning.

After what has now occurred we must require some assurance, some guarantee, that we may not be subjected to a sudden attack; we must know that this Spanish difficulty once removed there are no other lurking designs which may burst upon us like a thunder-storm. Count BISMARCK further stated that unless some assurance, some declaration, were given by France to the European Powers, or in some official form, the present solution of the Spanish question was a final and satisfactory settlement of the French demands, and that no further claims were to be raised; and if, further, a withdrawal or a satisfactory explanation of the menacing language held by the Duc de Grammont were not made, the Prussian Government would be obliged to seek explanation from France. It was impossible, added His Excellency, that Prussia could tamely and quietly sit under the affront offered to the King and to the nation by the menacing language of the French Government. I could not, said His Excellency, hold communication with the French Ambassador after the language held to Prussia by the French Minister for Foreign Affairs in the face of Europe.

From the foregoing observations of Count BISMARCK, your Lordship will perceive that unless some timely counsel, some friendly hand, can intervene to appease the irritation between the two Governments, the breach, in lieu of being closed by the solution of the Spanish difficulty, is likely to become wider.

By the 14th of July the fatal telegram, detailing a supposed insult to the French Ambassador, had arrived in Paris. Lord LYONS thus reports the change which immediately occurred in public feeling:

LORD LYONS TO EARL GRANVILLE.
[Received July 16.]

PARIS, July 14, 1870.

MY LORD: In my dispatch of yesterday I communicated to your Lordship the account given to me by the Duke DE GRAMMONT of the state of the question regarding the acceptance of the Crown of Spain by Prince LEOPOLD of Hohenzollern, and the recent withdrawal of that acceptance.

My dispatch was sent off at the usual hour, 7 o'clock in the evening. During the early part of the night which followed, the hope that it might yet be possible to preserve peace gained some strength. It was understood that the renunciation of his pretensions by Prince LEOPOLD himself had come to confirm that made on his behalf by his father, and that the Spanish Government had formally declared to the Government of France that the candidature of the Prince was at an end. The language of influential members of the Cabinet was more pacific, and it was thought possible that some conciliatory intelligence might arrive from Prussia and enable the Government to pronounce the whole question to be at an end.

But in the morning all was changed. A telegram was received from the French Chargé d'Affaires at Berlin, stating that an article had appeared in the Prussian Ministerial organ, the North German Gazette, to the effect that the French Ambassador had requested the King to promise never to allow a HOHENZOLLERN to be a candidate for the throne of Spain, and that His Majesty had thereupon refused to receive the Ambassador, and sent him word by an Aide-de-Camp that he had nothing more to say to him.

The Intelligence of the publication of this article completely changed the view taken by the French Government of the state of the question. The Emperor came into Paris from St. Cloud, and held a Council at the Tuileries, and it was considered certain that a declaration hostile to Prussia would be addressed at once by the Government to the Chambers.

I made every possible endeavor to see the Duc DE GRAMMONT, but was unable to do so. I sent him, however, a most pressing message by the Chief of his Cabinet, begging him, in the name of Her Majesty's Government, not to rush precipitately into extreme measures, and, at all events, not to commit the Government by a premature declaration to the Chambers. It would, I represented, be more prudent, and at the same time more dignified, to postpone addressing the Chambers at least until the time originally fixed—that is to say, until to-morrow.

In the meantime, although the news of the appearance of the article in the North German Gazette had not become generally known, the public excitement was so great, and so much irritation existed in the army, that it became doubtful whether the Government could withstand the cry for war, even if it were able to announce a decided diplomatic success. It was felt that when the Prussian article appeared in the Paris evening papers it would be very difficult to restrain the anger of the people, and it was generally thought that the Government would feel bound to appease the public impatience by formally declaring its intention to resent the conduct of Prussia.

The sittings of the Legislative Body and the Senate have, however, passed over without any communication having been made on the subject, and thus no irretrievable step has yet been taken by the Government.

I cannot, however, venture to give your Lordship any hope that war will now be avoided. I shall continue to do all that is possible, in the name of Her Majesty's Government, to avert this calamity; but I am bound to say that there is the most serious reason to apprehend that an announcement nearly equivalent to a declaration of war will be made in the Chambers to-morrow. I have, &c.,

LYONS.

The next day M. OLLIVIER made in the Corps Legislatif a statement equivalent to a declaration of war, and shortly afterward the British Ambassador had another interview with the Duc DE GRAMMONT, which he thus reports:

LORD LYONS TO EARL GRANVILLE.
[Received July 16.]

PARIS, July 15, 1870.

MY LORD: Since the announcement to the Chambers this afternoon, that the Government is actively preparing for war with Prussia, I have had an interview with the Duc DE GRAMMONT.

His Excellency spoke at once of the three memoranda which I left for him with the head of his Cabinet last night, and of which copies are inclosed in my previous dispatch of today.

With regard to the first, he desired me to express to Her Majesty's Government the thanks of the Government of the Emperor for the friendly endeavors which they had made to effect a satisfactory solution of the question with Prussia. The good offices of Her Majesty's Government had, however, been made of no effect by the last acts of the Prussian Government. That Government had deliberately insulted France by declaring to the public that the King had affronted the French Ambassador. It was evidently the intention of the Government of Prussia to take credit with the people of Germany for having acted with haughtiness and discourtesy—in fact, to humiliate France. Not only had the statement so offensive to France been published by the Government in its newspaper, but it had been communicated officially by telegraph to the Prussian agents throughout Europe.

Until this had been done the negotiation had been particularly private. It had, from the peculiar circumstances of the case, been carried on directly with the King of Prussia. The Prussian Minister for Foreign Affairs, Count BISMARCK, had been in the country, and it had been impossible to approach him. The acting Minister, M. DE THILE, professed to know nothing of the subject, and to consider it as a matter concerning not the Prussian Government but the King personally. Although the distinction was not in principle admissible, still it obliged France to treat with the King directly, and the French Ambassador had been sent to wait upon His Majesty at Ems. The negotiation had not proceeded satisfactorily, but so long as it remained private there were hopes of bringing it to a satisfactory conclusion. Nor, indeed, had the King of Prussia treated M. BENEDETTI with the rough discourtesy which had been boasted of by the Prussian Government. But that Government had now chosen to declare to Germany and to Europe that France had been affronted in the person of her Ambassador. It was this boast which was the gravamen of the offense. It constituted an insult which the nation of any spirit could brook, and rendered it, much to the regret of the French Government, impossible to take into consideration the mode of settling the original matter in dispute which was recommended by Her Majesty's Government. * * * *

Finally, M. DE GRAMMONT said that he knew the English way of going on, and was aware that we detested war, and, therefore, were disposed to look favorably upon those who were the first to commence hostilities. Still, he trusted that France would not lose the sympathy of England.

I said that if Her Majesty's Government had not been able to take exactly the same view of this unhappy dispute as the Government of the Emperor, I thought that they had, nevertheless, given most substantial proofs of friendship in the earnest endeavors they had made to obtain satisfaction for France. I could not deny that Her Majesty's Government had reason to feel disappointed, not to say hurt. They had been led to believe that the withdrawal of the Prince of HOHENZOLLERN from all pretensions to the crown of Spain was all that France desired. They had exerted themselves to the utmost to obtain this, and were then told that France required more. However this may be, there was, I said in conclusion, most certainly no diminution of the friendly feeling which had been the happy result of the cordial understanding which had now for so many years existed between the two Governments and the two nations. I have, &c.,

LYONS.

Dispatches from the British Ministers at St. Petersburg and Vienna detail the good advice given in concert with England by Russia and Austria. M. de WESTMANN said:

"That serious advice had already been given to the Prussian Government from St. Petersburg to act with prudence and moderation, and not to be influenced by feelings of irritation at the language of the Government or of the Press in France; and he hoped that if the King of Prussia declared solemnly that he had no part whatever in the selection of Prince LEOPOLD, or in his acceptance of the overtures made to him, the French Government would admit that they had no ground for war with Prussia. * * * But if France was determined to resent by a war against Prussia the accession of a Prince of HOHENZOLLERN to the crown of Spain, she might, unfortunately, find a pretext for so doing, by calling upon the Prussian Government to fulfill the stipulations in the Treaty of Prague with respect to Schleswig."

Count BEUST told Lord BLOOMFIELD that the Austrian Chargé d'Affaires at Berlin had been instructed "to do everything to promote the chance of a peaceable solution." Count BEUST said:

"That he had done what he could to dissuade France from pushing matters to extremities; but he did not seem to have great faith in his power to effect much, and his impression is that nothing is likely to avert the onward march of events. His Excellency added that perhaps no one was better able to judge of the state of feeling in the South German States than himself, and he could announce that if France counted on the sympathies of those States for her cause she would make a great mistake. With a view, therefore, to discourage her from looking to anything like support from that quarter, he had thought it well, in the interests of peace, to bring this conviction to her knowledge."

By the 16th of July the people of Paris and of Germany had risen, and war was inevitable.

THE FINGLETON HOMICIDE.

Inquest in the Case by Coroner Flynn—Evidence in Favor of the Accused—A Verdict of Justifiable Homicide Rendered.

An inquest was held, yesterday, by Coroner FLYNN, in the case of JAMES FINGLETON, who was killed, on the 1st inst., by ADAM LANGFIELD, a baker, at No. 514 East Fourteenth-street, with a bayonet, as already reported, because the deceased endeavored to take a loaf of bread. The following is an abstract of the evidence:

PATRICK REILLY, of No. — Fourteenth-street, testified that he and his brother MICHAEL, and one or two other young men, had been out for a good time on the night of the 31st of July, and about 1 o'clock the next morning they happened to pass LANGFIELD's bakery, when some one said, "Let us get a loaf of bread." The witness and deceased then went down, and witness asked the prisoner for a loaf of bread, when LANGFIELD refused to give it to them. They then went upstairs, and FINGLETON said he would go down and buy a loaf. The witness and deceased then went over again, and FINGLETON stepped out and offered to take out a loaf, when the prisoner told him to leave it alone. The prisoner then seized a club and struck both of the men, then picked up a gun with a bayonet. Witness then ran out of the bakery, followed by FINGLETON, and the prisoner pursued them up the steps and stabbed the deceased, and was afterward arrested. None of the parties were intoxicated.

THOMAS SANDS, of No. — East Sixteenth-street, was with the party, and saw PATRICK REILLY and FINGLETON go down for a loaf of bread. Some angry words occurred down there, but the witness did not know their purport. Both REILLY and FINGLETON then ran up the steps, when LANGFIELD came up and stabbed MICHAEL REILLY, who the witness took home, and remained with him until daylight, when he was arrested.

BERNARD COURTNEY, of No. 514 East Fourteenth-street, heard a noise and went down stairs, finding a man struggling with and on top of LANGFIELD; witness took the man off, and he walked away; two other men were standing at a short distance off; the prisoner had an old gun, and his wife was the only person with him.

JAMES MCCABE, another tenant in the house, heard a row, and saw four men come out of the bakery. One of them seemed excited, and, taking off his coat, threatened to shoot LANGFIELD. The prisoner came up with a gun and bayonet, saying, "You will shoot me, will you?" and then stabbed one of the men. There was another row soon after between the gang and the prisoner; witness was positive that the deceased was the man who threatened to shoot the prisoner. FINGLETON seemed to have no weapon.

PATRICK POWERS, another tenant, corroborated the previous evidence of MCCABE, and COURTNEY, and he was certain that LANGFIELD stood on the steps when he gave the stab, though the man wounded was not the deceased. Two officers then testified that they came on the scene soon after the occurrence, and that LANGFIELD made a charge against two or three men who had attempted to steal his bread. One of the gang said LANGFIELD had stabbed one of the gang, so all hands were taken into custody. LANGFIELD admitted the stabbing, and stated that one of the gang had taken a loaf of bread, and that the gang had assaulted him. He had used the old musket in self-defence. PATRICK REILLY was intoxicated and the others were also somewhat so. LANGFIELD was quite sober at the time.

The prisoner was then sworn, and testified that about half-past one o'clock A. M., on the 1st inst., PATRICK REILLY, the witness, came into his bakery and asked for a loaf of bread on trust; he told REILLY he had decided not to trust any one, when REILLY went away and spoke to some men in the street; REILLY and FINGLETON then came down, and while REILLY stood near LANGFIELD, FINGLETON went round and took some bread from a box; the prisoner took it from him, and taking both men by the collar threw them out of the place; the gang outside then rushed in, and, picking up some of the sticks used for setting bread, made an assault upon him; he defended himself as best he could with another stick, but was severely beaten, so he called watch and the gang ran out; they then made preparations for another assault, when LANGFIELD seized his gun and went up the steps; the deceased then said, "Stand aside and I'll shoot the —;" the prisoner then stabbed him as the deceased was putting his hand in his pocket as if to get a pistol; the prisoner stated that he believed they intended to kill him when he seized the gun and bayonet; after the stabbing LANGFIELD heard his wife's voice in the street, and, fearing for her safety, he ran out and was assaulted by three men who knocked him down and beat him.

Evidence was then introduced by the prisoner's counsel to show that FINGLETON had been arrested in May, 1868, for highway robbery, and duly indicted, though never tried, as the case had been settled in some way.

The jury rendered a verdict of justifiable homicide, and Mr. LANGFIELD was honorably discharged from custody.

OBITUARY.

Hon. George T. Cobb.

Among the victims of the last railroad horror on the Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad, near White Sulphur Springs, on Saturday, was Hon. GEO. T. COBB, of Morristown, N. J. Mr. COBB had been spending a few weeks at Greenbrier, White Sulphur Springs, earlier in the season, and was on his return thither when the accident occurred, throwing the car in which himself and his intimate friend, J. BOYD HEADLEY, Esq., were seated, down the precipice 100 feet, and both were instantly killed. In losing him New-Jersey has lost one of her most prominent public men, one who had served his State both in Congress and in the Legislature. He was born in Parsippany, N. J., in 1809, and by his own efforts accuired an ample fortune, of which he made a most liberal use. He had lately made a single donation of $100,000 to the Methodist Church in Morristown, of which he was a prominent and active member. Mr. COBB was actively engaged in business until 1855 when he retired. In 1858 he entered upon his political life as a Douglas Democrat, and was very active in the cause. In 1860 he was nominated and elected to Congress, but when the war broke out he declared himself an uncompromising Union man. In 1865 Mr. COBB was elected Safe Senator by the Republicans, although residing in a Democratic district. While a member of the Legislature, he was beaten as a candidate for the United States Senate by Hon. F. T. FRELINGHUYSEN. At the time of his death he was still a Senator, his term not expiring until 1872. He had been home from Virginia to make arrangements to attend the Methodist Camp-meeting at Danville, N. J., in which he was very much interested, as in everything relating to the church of his choice.

MONDAY, Aug. 8—P. M.

There was great rejoicing in and around Wall-street this morning on the Prussian victories. If this sentiment is not quite universal among our down-town people, it is so near so as to make the exceptions among our Merchants and Brokers and Bankers quite inconsiderable. The feeling on the one hand is not so much against France and Frenchmen as against their ruler, who so recently set the Continent in flames for purposes of selfish and dynastic ambition. On the other hand, the sympathies for Germany are alike pronounced and rational. The Germans were our friends when friends abroad were comparatively few in our early struggle against rebellion, and their services valuable when our credit most needed support both at home and abroad. Besides, the German-American element in our financial and mercantile circles is universally esteemed, and it is not surprising that our sympathies should go out with these people in favor of their friends and kindred in the fatherland.

The battle news was so decided in character, and the consequences to France so critical, unless peace be early restored through the intervention of the other Great Powers of Europe, as to cause a decline of Three ₱ cent. in Gold. The market closed 118¼, as against 121¼ on Saturday night. There was no great excitement in the Gold Room, owing to the slim attendance of the Brokers by reason of the greater attraction of the Yacht-race. The first sales were at 119, from which there was a recovery to 119⅜@119½, and a subsequent fall to 118¼@118½ ₱ cent.

As to steamer sails to-morrow, there was not much done in Exchange. The rates on London are 109½ ₱ cent. at 60 days, and 110½ at short sight. In regard to the shipments of Gold to Europe this week, the engagements promise to be moderate unless the War news should take an unfavorable turn.

Money keeps easy at 4@5 ₱ cent. on call loan to the Brokers, the Bank Statement of Saturday, although reflecting a contraction of movement, being but little spoken of.

On the Stock Exchange the attendance was so indifferent that no Afternoon Boards were held, and the Long Room was closed at 3 o'clock. Our Public Funds having advanced rapidly in London and Frankfort this morning on the Prussian victories, prices were higher here, notwithstanding the decline in Gold diminished the difference between the Foreign markets and our own. The 6 ₱ cents of 1881 and the 10-40s 5 ₱ cents advanced with the 5-20s, and the rise brought out but few sellers; there was much dullness in the Railway speculation, but so far as there was a demand the prices advanced ¼@½ ₱ cent. on Saturday's sales, and closed as follows at 3 o'clock as compared with the figures of Saturday:

NEWS OF THE DAY.

THE WAR.

London dispatches announce rumors of a great battle before Metz yesterday. At last accounts, McMAHON was at St. Auverne. His corps suffered less than was at first supposed. A change in the commanders of the French Army is announced. LEBOEUF retires, Marshal BAZAINE has been made Commander-in-Chief, and Gen. TROCHU Major-General. The Prussian Gen. STEINMETZ makes a detailed report of the recent fighting on Friday and Saturday, which is given in full in our dispatches. The heights of Spiechelen, it is said, were carried at the point of the bayonet. French reports are also given. Both accounts represent the struggle as having been fierce and bloody. The French artillery loss was heavy. Metz is preparing for a vigorous defense in anticipation of an attack. Paris has been declared in a state of siege, and active defensive measures are in progress. In the report of the Minister of War, approved by the Empress, it is stated that France can arm 2,000,000 of defenders, and 1,000,000 in addition, to be held in reserve. A National Committee will be formed with power to act under all circumstances arising from the war. Forbach was taken on Saturday, and is now held by the Prussian forces. NAPOLEON regards the situation as "critical," but says the French troops are yet full of confidence. The Prussians menace Metz and St. Avold. They claim that they will have 800,000 men in the theatre of war today. Public illuminations were made in Hamburg, Dresden and Breslau on Sunday evening, in honor of the victory.

The Paris Journal Officiel denies the loss of eagles or cannon at Weissenburg. The author of the false report of victory in Paris has been arrested. The Senate and Corps Legislatif have been summoned, by an Imperial decree, to meet today. Paris is thought in London to be in danger. The reported illness of NAPOLEON is said to be a return of his old trouble, caused by too much equestrian exercise. The ORLEANS Princes are said to be spending money liberally in aiding the French wounded. The 14,000,000 of francs seized in Paris last week belonged to Jewish bankers; the act, it is reported, was incited by the Bank of France, and it is deemed a great outrage in financial circles. Ships are still entering the Elbe and Weser, notwithstanding the blockade. It is thought in Antwerp that the war will close in a week. Frankfort on the Main is being fortified with 300-pound guns. A French ram is cruising off Dover. The Prussian iron-clad Harmonia barely escaped capture off the mouth of the Elbe. The British Government has refused to prohibit the exportation of arms. The London Times, in an article on the situation yesterday, is in doubt as to whether the health of NAPOLEON leaves him in possession of his ordinary faculties in the present crisis. It thinks he will have to accept battle instantly, and that the time is not far distant when England will be called in as a mediator. The Pall Mall Gazette considers the battle decisive as against France. The Paris Journal Officiel is of the opinion that Europe desires an equilibrium of power, and that therefore the existing state of affairs will conspire for the benefit of France, strengthening rather than weakening her with other Powers. The German Press regard the French reverses as irretrievable.

In reply to the charges made against him by Gen. TURR, BISMARCK has written a letter in which he says that the General "is not a person to be trusted with political confidences." Prussia has demanded of England that coal shipments to France shall cease, or the pretended neutrality be abandoned. Prussia also insists that British pilots serving France shall be criminally prosecuted. The speech of King WILLIAM from the throne confirms, it is said, the statement that both belligerents will respect Belgian neutrality, France and Prussia having signed a written agreement to this effect. It was also stated in the British Parliament, last night, that the security of Belgium was now assured. Advices from Rome are to the effect that the French disasters cause profound terror. The Pope has asked EUGENIE for one ship of war to defend him from the Italians, who are thought to be organizing for an attack on the Papal dominions. The feeling in Ireland is one of sorrow. Demonstrations in favor of France continue to be made.

The propeller Parthenia, running between Hartford and this city, was destroyed by fire on Sunday night, three miles east of Faikner Island. The fire was accidental. After an unsuccessful effort to extinguish it, the crew took to the boats, and were saved. The steamer drifted aground near Guilford Point, and was there burned up. Fortunately, no lives were lost, and the cargo on board was light.

Messrs. LEGGETT, RUSHMORE and GROTE, of the Board of Supervisors, and F. W. GILLEY, GEORGE W. SMITH and BARRETT, School Commissioners.

France at Bay.

These are the darkest days France has been called upon to pass through since 1815. Fear and anxiety hang over every household in Paris. A few days ago the majority of the French people believed that their armies would never be uprooted from German soil until Prussia sued for peace. With startling suddenness, the whole prospect has been changed. It is a question not of marching to Berlin, but of saving Paris. The Emperor has fled to Chalons, apparently in the desperate hope of stemming the tide of invasion should it penetrate beyond Metz. The disaster is too vast to be disguised. The French Ministry, instead of announcing triumphs, can only beseech the people to go forth to the defense of their native land. Those who have seen in this war only a question between NAPOLEON and BISMARCK, between despotism and freedom, between one man and the ascendency of liberal ideas, would naturally suppose that this appeal for fresh armies would be unheeded. They leave out of consideration the fact that, when a proud nation sees its existence threatened, it will generally push all political differences aside, and strike for the preservation of its honor. If NAPOLEON perished to-morrow this war would go on. Already the National Guard are clamoring to be led to the front. The love of "Fatherland," which we praise in the Germans, is not extinct in the French, and although our sympathies are withdrawn from the latter people in their struggle, we may assume for the present that the invasion of their soil by a foreign army will not be a subject of rejoicing with them.

But the crisis is tremendous. Even France with all her resources may not be able to cope successfully with it. The Prussian commanders are succeeding by the same tactics as those which they found so efficient in the Austrian campaign. While the enemy is laying plans for an advance, they hurl vast masses of men upon him, and swallow him up. Thus they gain an inestimable advantage at the outset of the struggle. It was said of the Austrians that they did not fight so well as the Prussians, and that they were not so well armed. Mr. DICEY wrote, in 1866, "The Prussians have not as yet had the opportunity of showing how their troops would conduct themselves if confronted by an army which attacked them with the vigor of the French." The test has now been made, and the result is a repetition of Königgrätz. The Prussian Army, and the Prussian system of tactics, are still invincible. Every part of NAPOLEON'S plans has been brought to utter confusion. If he had any chance at all to begin with, he very soon lost it. He has now to lead a beaten army. The magic which still clung to the name of NAPOLEON in the minds of the soldiers is gone. It is an alarming emergency which the French Chambers will be called upon to consider today.

The Journal Officiel of yesterday tells us that the relations of the French Government with the neutral Powers continue to be satisfactory. These relations would probably be much more satisfactory if some of the Great Powers would throw off their neutrality, and send a few battalions to the aid of France. If the position of England is "satisfactory" to herself, she enjoys that satisfaction alone. Prussia is covertly threatening her, and France is deeply incensed. It is the story of our own war over again. England's policy, if a series of blunders can be dignified with the name of policy, is so contrived as to offend both sides at once. England may some day be called upon to account both to France and Prussia for pursuing a course which pretended to be strictly neutral, and was in reality inimical to both. When that time arrives she will find it more hopeless to look for allies than France does now. She has sown the seeds of hatred all over the world, and the crop of vengeance will assuredly spring up. The bulk of the people in England know nothing about foreign politics—the organs of "public opinion" generally run wild in times of excitement. Thus it happens that at this moment Prussia is shaking the rod over England's back, and France remembers that she has something besides Waterloo to avenge.

Meanwhile, France is called upon to make fresh sacrifices in behalf of this new war for an "idea." The Ministers think the National Guard can defend Paris, but "there is a point not less essential—it is the necessity of filling up the void in our army." They deal plainly with the people—there is no help for it. It will be necessary to call out all available forces—even a portion of the gendarmerie. So soon has this great Power been reduced to its last resources! The "seven-weeks' war" with Austria was not half so startling, for Austria was ill-prepared, and knew nothing of her antagonist's strength. France has been making preparations for years, and yet two days' fighting disperses a magnificent army, and obliges her to bring another into the field, gathered from all quarters.

The Ministers boast that they can still bring forward two millions of men to meet the invader, all armed, and many of them trained soldiers. They are not afraid to call out those forces which are ordinarily supposed to be less favorable to the Empire than the regular army. So far we hear of no dissensions. A common danger unites the country—just as a common danger lately united Germany. A foolish telegram from Antwerp says that "the opinion" there is that the war will be over in a week. Antwerp was, we believe, a place of some importance in the fifteenth century, but we were not aware till today that the opinion of its inhabitants at present decides the fates of Empires, or is a potent factor in European politics. It is probable, however, the opinion of these omniscient burghers notwithstanding, that it will take more than a week to break either of the great Powers now arrayed against each other.

Disinterring the Dead.

Among the curiosities of Southern politics must be placed the proposal of a few antediluvians in Tennessee and other States to revive the Whig organization, as the basis of a third party movement. The reasoning with which the proposition is supported is intelligible, though far from cogent. It starts with an assumption that the Democratic and Radical Republican Parties are both too extreme—that while the latter invades the "reserved rights of States" in furtherance of reconstruction, the former threaten the South with renewed anarchy as a result of hostility to reconstruction. Ancient Whigs step forward at this stage with a talk of compromise. That, indeed, was always a favorite idea with them. In every difficulty they were ready with a compromise. They prescribed it at every fresh stage of the Slavery difficulty, and even after the struggle for the Union had fairly commenced. Now they think that compromise is once more possible. And they invite moderate Republicans to meet moderate Democrats on ground occupied by the Silver Grays as long as that section of the Whig Party had an existence;—the purpose, so far as we comprehend it, being to blend respect for State rights with the recognition of certain accomplished facts. The precise nature of these facts does not clearly appear. We take it, however, that they imply the acceptance of the situation as made by the laws now in force, with reliance upon constitutional methods of re-establishing old relations between the States and the General Government.

We will not impeach the amiability, or assail the motives, of the venerable sages who propose thus to disinter the dead. Their intentions are excellent, we have no doubt. Of their sagacity we cannot say so much. Some of them went to sleep when Mr. FILLMORE retired from the Presidency, and continued to slumber all through the war. They awake now, like so many Rip Van Winkles,—bewildered by the strange sights and sounds around them, and knowing no more the places that once knew them so well. Others found in their States rights' views a passport to rebel Democratic favor, and now propose a dissolution of ten years partnership, in the vain hope and expectation that the world will listen to them as to prophets risen from the dead. They would have us accept the Bell and Everett platform, with modifications adapting it to emancipation as an irreversible fact.

Our venerable friends will not travel far before stumbling over rocks displaced by the earthquakes of the war period. Like other prophets, they will be without honor in their own country. The practical portion of the Southern people,—those, we mean, who whether approving or disapproving of reconstruction on its merits, acquiesce in the changes it has wrought, and trust to lawful agencies for the correction of its abuses and defects,—will contemplate them half in pity and half in merriment. The impracticables, on the other hand, will spurn them and their plans as of old they spurned Whig compromises,—preferring to fight out their battle on the ultra Democratic line. Whether they talk the Whiggism of seventeen years ago, as in Tennessee, or the dubious Conservatism of which we read in Virginia, the ultimate result will be the same. Good intentions will not save them from contempt. They will propose fine resolutions and do nothing. The Republicans will go on their way, healing their dissensions as best they can; and the Democrats will pursue their course, the moderates and extremists waging an angry warfare. The ghost-like Whigs will exert no influence on either party.

War by Machinery.

The dispatches relating to the battle of Hagenau have probably informed most people for the first time that the Prussians, as well as the French, are in possession of those cumbrous pieces of ordnance, known to the latter as mitrailleuses, and the former as kugelspitzen. A well-informed writer in a late number of the Pall Mall Gazette directs attention to the fact that the mitrailleuse is not, by any means, a new weapon; that its principle is nearly identical with that of FIESCHI'S infernal machine of 1835—that repeated experiments have been made during the last three years by the British and other European Governments with various known varieties of this many-barreled field-piece, and that the result of these experiments has demonstrated that the meudon or French mitrailleuse is not the most effective weapon of the kind. This writer attributes the mystery and parade which have attended the introduction of the new gun into the French service, to the necessity there existed for reviving the confidence of the troops in the superiority of their arms—a confidence which had been rudely shaken by the Prussian successes of 1866. It was claimed that the new weapon would revolutionize the art of warfare, and would in time supersede both field artillery and infantry. An inventor of one form of the gun denominated it "infantry by mechanism." Looked at apart from its ponderous wagon-like carriage and other paraphernalia, the mitrailleuse is simply a breech-loading gun, with from ten to thirty barrels, having a mechanical arrangement for inserting the cartridges, and a handle which turns either the breech or the barrels and effects the discharge. The experience of the battles of Friday and Saturday last has amply demonstrated that in rapid movements over an extended front it is comparatively useless. Significantly enough, we have no details of any execution done by the French Mitrailleuses at Hagenau, while the Prussian arm is admitted to have been destructive. The explanation of this will probably be found in the fact that the French General attempted to make his unwieldy field-pieces do the work of intelligent and well-directed infantry amid difficult and broken ground, while the Prussians were content to relegate them to their legitimate use of defending a narrow point from the brunt of an enemy's attack.

It is scarcely necessary to remark that the exaggerated expectations which have been formed in the French Army about the probable performances of the Mitrailleuses, will be followed by a corresponding depression when their comparative failure becomes fully evident. The present campaign bids fair to deepen the impression received from our own civil war, and from the German war of 1866, that intelligence on the field of battle is a more powerful engine than merely mechanical proficiency in drill, and that an educated soldiery is in nearly every case more than a match for the ignorant and the unintelligent, however proficient in the routine of warfare. It is true that no nation can safely neglect either the perfecting of its weapons or the details of its military tuition, but it is none the less true that it will neutralize the effect of both unless it can bring into the field men who have a sufficient amount of intelligence to adapt themselves to special circumstances, and to take prompt advantage of apparent weakness in their adversaries.

Putting the Cart Before the Horse.

The eagerness of many persons to nominate candidates in advance of Conventions which are called to select the most available men is somewhat embarrassing. It is a weakness which the approach of an election, State or national, invariably develops. In the first place, it gratifies a fondness for personal display, from which even the most modest of men are not altogether exempt. And in the next place, it furnishes an opportunity for establishing a prospective title to influence, if the individual nominated by the prophet receive the approval of a Convention, and the more important support of the people. For these reasons, we do not expect to see the time when this anticipatory parade of names will cease. But the regularity of its recurrence proves neither its propriety nor its expediency.

A Convention whose business is to lay the foundation of a campaign, and to choose as candidates men who combine in the highest degree capacity, fitness, and popularity, should be, as far as possible, unencumbered by outside combinations. Certainly it should be free from outside dictation. There are periods when the popular voice has so distinctly pronounced its preference that the delegates, in nominating a candidate, do little more than register a popular decree. But these cases are exceptional. The general rule is, that the Convention finds itself at liberty to select from a full list of competent men,—its main embarrassments arising from attempts of cliques or combinations to force upon it their favorite candidate, with slight allowance for the claims of others, or the ultimate effect upon the fortunes of the party. The difficulties thus created lead almost continually to the nomination of inferior men. To escape from the conflicting pretensions of the friends of really strong men, the Convention falls back upon a class whose relative insignificance constitutes their only title to consideration.

From a repetition of this experience in the Fall campaign, the Republicans of this State, and of many other States, may pray to be delivered. The work before them is not child's play. We have need of a well defined, broad, liberal, and just policy, covering the new issues of which Mr. COLFAX has spoken. We also need candidates who, besides being accepted as exponents of such a policy, may be relied upon to promote the unity, command the respect, and excite the enthusiasm of the party. Without this policy, the party will lack evidence of its ability to satisfy the wants of the country. Without candidates of this class, the party will enter upon an arduous contest weakened by divisions, and cursed by an apathy which only the most judicious action on the part of the Convention can remove.

The fact that the construction of a platform precedes all else is sufficient to show the danger and folly of premature nominations. The first duty of the Convention is to define the ground on which the party is to conduct the contest; and this ground, as we have said, must embrace the new points which derive importance from the present circumstances of the Republic. Thus, a platform which takes no notice of the shipping question, and the necessity of so amending the Registry laws as to secure a restoration of the carrying trade, will leave untouched a vital difference between the President and the monopolists, and a vital want of the community. And so with half a dozen other questions. The Republican Party must make its purposes understood, or it will fight under serious disadvantages. And its policy in this respect will necessarily have much to do with the choice of candidates. Give us first a strong, comprehensive platform, and then talk of candidates suited to its character. It is quite possible to make a choice which will harmonize the party and contribute to the triumph which we believe to be within its reach.

The Yacht-Race.

The race for the possession of the Queen's Cup is over, and that much-prized trophy remains in American hands. The contest appears to have been conducted with spirit and skill, and reflects credit upon all engaged in it. The mischance which happened to the Cambria cannot be held to have determined the final result, for, even making all possible allowance for accident, she was fairly defeated. American yachtsmen may therefore be justly congratulated upon a gallant victory, as well as upon the honorable retention of a testimony to their superiority in the building and management of their vessels.

After an event of this nature there is always a close criticism of the behavior of particular yachts, and of the causes for the various relative failures or triumphs during the course of the race. For example, the Cambria was by some asserted to be sure of defeat, for the reason that from her heavy build she was more adapted to an ocean voyage than a short homestretch. But the man who makes a challenge is supposed to comprehend the conditions of victory. Mr. ASHBURY himself would probably be the last to assert that he labored under disadvantages to which all his competitors were not equally liable. It would naturally have been gratifying to him if he could have won the international champion cup—but he has failed, and is not likely to deny the full credit of the victory to the quarter where it belongs.

Yesterday's experience proves that yachting, as a healthy and manly pastime, is more popularly employed in matches in home contests than in long voyages. Under no circumstances can a race across the Atlantic be other than accidental with this class of vessels. Besides, yachting is a recreation in which the friends and families of owners are much interested, either as witnesses or participators. Yesterday's race, with its accompaniments of bright weather, a glorious breeze, and an exciting bustle of sail and steam upon the water, was a source of delight to thousands who would never realize from mere description the run of three thousand miles of two or more yachts hardly ever spoken by passing ships. There is, moreover, ample room for the exercise of courage, training, and skill in a race round the light-ship at Sandy Hook or to Cape May. It would have been an agreeable thing if we could have recorded the success of the Dauntless in yesterday's race, but as it turned out, we will only tender our congratulations to all the American contestants of yesterday upon the fact that a prize won so many years ago is still their own, and that they are still able to challenge all the world to a struggle for its possession.

Orson Once More.

For some years past a wild man has been running loose about the country, to whom we feel compelled to direct the attention of the proper authorities. If we remember rightly, he first came to public notice in the Everglades of Florida. He was then a soldier of the United States Army who had lost first himself, and then his reason, in the campaign against the Seminoles. Thence he made his way westward to Louisiana, and turned up as an escaped lunatic. Lending a deaf ear to the bloodhounds, shot-guns, and similar mild persuasives to civilization which the good people of the neighborhood brought to bear upon his wildness, he shook from his feet the dust of that ungrateful State, and made his way to Tennessee. Here in some unaccountable manner he changed his sex, and disported himself for some time as a wild woman, the victim of unrequited love. After many surprising vicissitudes and hair-breadth 'scapes by flood and field in Indiana and Illinois, he reappears once more, in masculine guise, among the mountains of Nevada, as a lost soldier of FREMONT'S Exploring Expedition of 1846. We have already done justice to him in this capacity. He amused himself by assaulting emigrant encampments, stampeding mules, beating them with a huge club, and uttering unearthly howls. He was then covered from head to foot with long hair, and had altogether an uninviting appearance. After stirring up the local press to an unusual pitch of excitement he suddenly disappeared, and we thought we were finally rid of him.

But it was an ominous quiet. Whether, disguised for the nonce as a human being, he journeyed hitherward on the railway-cars, whether he joined a traveling circus, and came in character, or whether he made his way on foot by night, with that more than Western celerity which characterizes him, will probably never be known. But it is certain that only a day or two ago he was recognized in Orange County. Proximity to civilization seems to have tamed his hardihood, for he fled on being approached, though his lungs were still in good order, and he howled bravely. Apparently, too, he has had himself shaved, for we miss the long, shaggy hair which in all previous descriptions covered him from head to foot. But despite these evidences of improvement, we are afraid it will still be necessary to abolish this wild man. We have enough of the kind hereabouts already. So long as he confined himself to the outskirts of civilization we could endure him. Indeed, he was rather picturesque than otherwise, and lent occasional variety and freshness to journals that were ordinarily dull. But his notions of personal decency are altogether too crude to be tolerated in any civilized community, and unless he condescends to clothe himself at least, we warn him that his career in these parts will speedily come to an end. If our wild friend will conquer his natural repugnance to apparel, and come to this city, we predict for him a brilliant career. He is sure to win distinction in local politics, and at primary meetings, charter elections, or Orange processions, his eccentricities would give him foremost rank. If he commits a murder, there will be hundreds of carriages at his funeral, and no end of "societies" will "mourn his loss," while the American flag will be wrapped round his honored remains. He would never have had such a chance out West.

The slow and cautious movements which military strategists were once so fond of are probably not destined to be witnessed again. Why NAPOLEON did not anticipate the Prussians in their brilliant system of attack will perhaps not be known until we hear his "vindication" of the campaign—perhaps from exile, for if his failure should be complete, Paris would never be a home for him again. The Prussians have dazzled the world with the rapidity of their movements. At first they waited to be attacked, but soon growing impatient, they were led into the very teeth of the enemy, and unquestionably managed to give a good account of them. The same tactics will now be pursued to the end. How NAPOLEON can hope to recover his lost ground is inconceivable. Probably he would be well satisfied to know that he could save himself from being driven back further than Chalons. At present Prussia stands forth as the first military Power in the world.

If the French propose to make a naval attack at the mouth of the Elbe, it is high time they set about it. Hamburg is nearer to Berlin than Metz is to Paris, but unfortunately for the Emperor, his movements in this, as in other respects, have been somewhat dilatory, and while the Germans were busily engaged in blocking the navigation of their great northern river the French expedition was still at Cherbourg. The fact is also to be borne in mind that even after the delays inseparable from nautical movements on an enemy's waters have been overcome, and Hamburg has been duly bombarded, there is an army of 58,000, under Gen. FALKENSTEIN, ready to give the invaders a warm reception, and capable of being tripled long before such a force as the Emperor could now spare should be on the way to Berlin.

The frequency with which railroad accidents occur is no reason for passing them over without comment or remonstrance. A number of persons are killed, a number more maimed for life, a "supposition" of the cause is arrived at, and there is an end of the whole affair. This is not quite enough to satisfy justice, or to encourage the public in a sense of security. In every case of the kind full investigation ought to be made, and the blame, where there is blame, fixed upon the right persons. The Virginia disaster was the result of a coach forming part of a train running off the track, and the usual "broken wheel" is spoken of as the main cause of the accident. And yet the train was proceeding at a rate not exceeding six miles an hour. Could the accident have happened if the rails or the wheels had been properly inspected?

Some diplomatic correspondence, of which we give an abstract elsewhere, will be interesting to all who desire to preserve important historical documents bearing upon the war. It leaves very little doubt as to the fact that if France had made up her mind to go to war, Prussia was not at all anxious to restrain her. Indeed, Count BISMARCK'S expressions to Lord LOFTUS seem to render it probable that if France had receded, Prussia would have pressed her so hard as to have rendered war inevitable. It will also be noticed that Lord LYONS, the British Ambassador in Paris, testifies that public opinion in France demanded war, and that the Ministry would probably have been overthrown if it had gone down to the Chambers and talked of peace.

The further proceedings before the Coroner yesterday, in relation to the horrible murder of Mr. NATHAN, will be found fully reported in another column, and will, doubtless, be read with interest. The testimony was not by any means fresh, but was highly important as tending to establish certain material points in the theory of the murder already put forth in these columns. The same evidence, of course, utterly annihilates the wicked stories woven by our sensational contemporaries. If the witnesses examined yesterday are to be believed, it would seem almost an absolute certainty that but one person committed the murder, and that he was an outsider, who easily effected an escape, leaving an open door behind him. Gen. BLAIR'S testimony as to the door being open, and also as to the fact of Mr. FREDERICK NATHAN'S night-shirt being perfectly bloodless a few minutes before the Police were summoned, is most emphatic, and to our mind conclusive. Of course the stupid officer who first appeared upon the scene reiterates the statement that the door was fastened at 4½ and shut at 5¾ o'clock on that morning, but who will believe him, in the face of overwhelming evidence to the contrary? A charitable view of his case would lead us to say that he "lost his head" on that memorable occasion, and that he doesn't know what he did see. The newsboy's story is scarcely more satisfactory than that of the policeman. It savors too strongly of the sensational to be fully received. The lad probably saw very little, if anything, of what he relates, and it may be that without intending to tell an untruth, he has allowed his fancy full play, and in many points gone so far into the incredible as to lose himself utterly. The theory as to how the chair-bottom became besmeared with blood and hair, is worthy of consideration, seeming, as it does, to be the only rational one thus far presented. It is to be regretted that we are apparently no nearer the criminal today than we were ten days ago.

A gentleman of high position, in London, had a wife who was connected with many of the leading members of the nobility. The other day she ran away with another man, and the injured husband adopted a different method of avenging his wrong from that which is sometimes pursued. He merely advertised a reward of £5 for the discovery of the lady. As this did not bring her back, he announced that he would give a further sum of £2 for her restoration, and that under no circumstances would the reward be increased. Thus he caused it to be made known that he assessed the value of the partner of his joys at the precise sum of £7. If the gentleman with whom the wife eloped is flattered by this estimate, it is probably more than the lady is herself.

The census returns are making sad havoc with the pretensions of most of our great cities as to the number of their inhabitants. Chicago, for instance, which has been boasting loudly of having four hundred thousand people, is shown to have less than three hundred thousand, possibly not over 250,000. Although this is a marvelous growth for a city not yet forty years old, it will not satisfy those who have fondly anticipated a much more striking result from the census

YALE SCIENTIFIC EXPEDITION.

Further News from Prof. Marsh—Exploration of the Loup Fork Region—Future Movements.

From Our Special Correspondent.

CHEYENNE, Wyoming Territory, Tuesday, Aug. 2, 1870.

It is with great pleasure that I am able to assure those who are interested in the progress of our exploring party that, despite some hardships and divers experiences calculated to test to the utmost our capacities of endurance, we are all well and enjoying our trip exceedingly. We are also satisfied that the objects for which this party were organized bid fair to be attended with the most gratifying success. I wrote you a few hurried lines from Fort McPherson on the 24th ult., announcing our safe arrival at that post, and stating that our party was about starting for an extended exploration of the Loup Fork region. On Saturday last (the 30th) the scientific party with Prof. MARSH returned from the Loup Fork, having accomplished the main object of the expedition in the exploration of the valley of that river. It is a comparatively unknown country, but seldom visited by white men, and we entered on the journey with some misgivings as to the reception we might meet with from the dusky owners of the soil. Fortunately, however, no scalps were lost and the red men concluded to let us severely alone. Our success is in a large measure due to our gallant escort, consisting of Lieut. REILLY, with Company I of the Fifth United States Cavalry, and to Major NORTH with his Pawnee scouts, these latter acting as our guides.

THE LOUP FORK REGION.

The Yale party were mounted on Indian ponies, a small, but hardy race of horses, which even on forced marches easily keep pace with the large American horses of the regular troops. But on this trip there was little occasion to test either their speed or their endurance, for a day's march rarely exceeded twenty miles. Our first encampment was at Spring Creek, fifteen miles north of Fort McPherson. From there a hard march of thirty-two miles, without a drop of water for man or beast, and the thermometer standing at 110° Fahrenheit, brought us to the south branch of the Loup. Between the Platte and the main branch of the Loup the whole country is but little better than a desert, characterized by a succession of high sand hills with but little vegetation. Toward the north these sand hills rise steeper and higher, and near the Loup River they are almost inaccessible for wagons. Not a tree grows in this desert region, and water can be obtained only by long marches. We made our third encampment on the border of an alkaline lake, the waters of which the horses, with commendable good taste, refused to drink. From this stagnant pool two days of difficult traveling, through a sandy, barren country unknown even to our Indian guides, brought us to the Loup River. Pine and cottonwood grow on the banks, and at intervals the water has cut away the sand bluffs and formed deep ravines, extending, in some cases, fully five hundred yards from the river. Here was the field for the operations of our party, and joyfully did we proceed to our labors. Remains of extinct animals were found to be abundant in the white tertiary loam, and many interesting and important discoveries were made, of which I shall have more to say hereafter.

INDIAN REMINISCENCES.

Our party proceeded up the river by easy marches, examining carefully every point of interest and every foot of ground. At various places we found recent Sioux encampments; and occasionally, on a raised platform of shields, reposed the remains of a warrior wrapped in his buffalo robes, decked with beads and bracelets, and his tomahawk and other arms lying beside him. From one of these singular tombs we obtained a shot-gun and a pack of cards. But the living "braves" did not show themselves. Once only a scout was seen riding away in the distance. However, the Indians set fire to the prairies around us, and to avoid the flames we were obliged to cross and recross the river. On the evening of the 21st the fire swept along the opposite river bank climbing the high bluffs in waving lines of flame, and lighting up the camp for hours. Beyond our encampment the whole country was consumed, and forage was obtained with great difficulty.

THE RETURN.

At the head-waters of the Loup, Prof. MARSH determined to abandon the Niobrara Valley exploration trip. The order of Gen. AUGUR limited the absence of our escort to twenty days; and this time having nearly expired, on the 25th we turned south toward the head-quarters of the Birdwood, and by long marches reached North Platte City on the fourth day, laying out a new and comparatively easy trail to the head-waters of the Loup. Our trip extended over about 250 miles. The party having been handsomely entertained by the officers at Fort McPherson, left for Fort D. A. Russell on Sunday, the 31st. On the 4th we intend to start on our second expedition, leaving that post to explore the geology of the country between the forks of the Platte, and having for escort Capt. MONTGOMERY and Lieut. STAMBOUL, with Company B of the Fifth United States Cavalry. B.

POLITICAL NOTES.

The Democratic papers in the Twelfth Ohio District are canvassing the probabilities of the next nomination for Congress, and they divide the district between Judge PHILADELPHIA VAN TRUMP, the present Representative, and Dr. GRISWOLD, of Pickaway, leaving Ross County in the position of holding the balance of power.

The Alabama Democratic State Convention meets at Montgomery Sept. 1, and the Republican at Selma Aug. 30. The latter nominate a State ticket and one Congressman, or more, if the new apportionment permit it.

The Michigan Democratic State Convention meets at Detroit Aug. 31.

The Republicans of the Second Tennessee District, according to the Knoxville Chronicle, will nominate Hon. HORACE MAYNARD for Representative in the Forty-second Congress.

A meeting of the Pennsylvania State Committee is called for Aug. 16 at Altoona, to organize the party for the Fall campaign.

The Franklin County Pennsylvania Republican Convention renominates Hon. JOHN CESSNA for Congress. WM. MCSHERRY declines to allow the Democrats to use his name as a candidate.

At the recent County Convention of Fulton County, Pennsylvania, the Democrats nominated GEORGE A. SMITH, Esq., for Congress, subject to the action of the District Convention.

The Republicans of York County, Pennsylvania, make no county nominations this year, in order that good men of all parties may be free to unite in defeating the Democrats, who are increasing the county indebtedness.

The list of presumed or suspected Republican candidates for Governor of New-York has already reached fifteen.

Three States will be largely affected in the Fall campaign by the negro vote. Delaware, it is calculated, will be turned over to the Republicans, several Congressional districts in Maryland may be reversed, and the New-Jersey Republican vote will be augmented by 5,000.

A Democratic editor in Quincy, Ill., in repelling the insinuation that he is a candidate for nomination to Congress, admits frankly that neither by the gifts of nature or cultivation is he qualified, and he does not see why he should follow the example of those whose vanity and presumption lead them, with no better qualifications than his, to thrust themselves forward into positions in which he could only succeed in making an ass of himself. Somebody must have been hit by this modest man.

The Republicans of the Fifth Illinois Congressional District have adopted a novel mode of nominating a candidate. They decided not to call a convention, but, instead thereof, they appointed a primary party election on Sept. 8, in which the Republicans of the district shall nominate a candidate by ballot—a plurality deciding. "The action of the Committee," says the Chicago Post, "is severely denounced, and it is said that a convention will be called—whether by the friends of Gen. HENDERSON or Mr. INGERSOLL, we are not informed."

Mr. GEO. W. MINIER, of Tazewell County, Ill., declines the temperance nomination for the Eighth Congressional District.

WAR NEWS BY MAIL.

ARRIVAL OF THE STEAMSHIP CITY OF LONDON.

The steamship City of London, from Liverpool July 28, and Queenstown July 29, arrived at this port last night. She brings two days later war news than that brought by the Idaho. We are enabled by this arrival to lay before our readers another instalment of correspondence from the principal points at the seat of war, which will throw much light on events imperfectly described by telegraphic outlines.

CONTINENTAL SUMMARY.

Count Bismarck's Last Dodge—The One-Sided Treaty of Alliance—Singular Disclosures About Benedetti—The French Government and the Press—Pretensions of Prussia on the War—Prim Again Intriguing with Prussia.

From Our Own Correspondent.

PARIS, Wednesday, July 27, 1870.

The great topic occupying the attention of journalists and of the public here at present is the apocryphal treaty of alliance between France and Prussia, published by order of Machiavellian BISMARCK in his Prussian organ of London, the Times. This treaty is intended to convey the impression to Europe that France has been secretly negotiating to obtain possession of certain portions of European territory—in plain terms, to aggrandize herself at the expense of the existence of Belgium. La Liberté insists that from reliable sources it is prepared to affirm that this pretended treaty is the purest fiction, and was actually drawn up by a creature of BISMARCK'S—a Frenchman—at one time a proof-reader in a printing house at Frankfort, now a confidential correspondent of the Prussian Chancellorship at Berlin. With the assistance of a certain M. DE SAVIGNY, an accomplice of BISMARCK, of late rather out of favor, this affair was concocted and found so admirable by the chief of Prussian diplomacy that he made it a present to the Times, who gave it the honors of its columns, although its editors must have been aware of its fictitious character. In fact, no one who has kept himself informed on the affairs of Continental Europe, can fail to know that for three years—from the moment of the Congress at Frankfort, until the battle of Sadowa, BISMARCK has not ceased to offer Belgium to the Emperor NAPOLEON. Another story goes that the proposed treaty was hatched at Nikilsburg, and was sent by BISMARCK to Baron GOLTZ, Prussian Ambassador at Paris. It was submitted by him to the French Foreign Office, and after its discussion by Baron GOLTZ, Count BENEDETTI, French Ambassador to the Court of Berlin, and the Marquis DE LA VALLETTE, the then French Minister of Foreign Affairs, it was laid before the Emperor, who peremptorily rejected it. Le Constitutionnel of this morning has a leader filled with indignation at this ignoble attack upon the Emperor, which it affirms is only a proof that, in the phase of pourparlers preceding the declaration of war, frankness and straightforwardness were invariably to be found on the side of the Imperial Government, while the course of the Prussian diplomatist was continually marked by subterfuges and disloyalty.

BUREAU FOR WAR NEWS.

An animated discussion took place yesterday in the Council of Ministers with regard to the means of conveying information from the camp and field during the war. Gen. LEBŒUF (now absent with the army) is well known to be hostile to publicity with regard to army movements, but the Emperor is entirely in favor of giving every facility for obtaining accurate advices from the field. Some of the Ministers advocated the old lying system of the "bulletins" of the First Empire; others proposed establishing a bureau for correspondence, subject to military censorship, so that none but actual facts might transpire. The result of this discussion appears in today's Journal Officiel, which gives out that a "bureau for information, destined to furnish the Press with news from the seat of war, will be established from to-morrow at the Ministry of the Interior. In order that the various journals of Paris may profit by these communications, it will suffice that each one of them accredit one of their correspondents to the Minister of the Interior. This Bureau of publicity, open from 8 in the morning until midnight, will communicate all official intelligence as it reaches the Ministry."

FINANCIAL CRISIS IN BERLIN.

A great financial crisis exists in Berlin, no discounts under 8 per cent. allowed. The Prussian Government is seeking vainly up to the present time to raise loans to enable it to carry on the war. In London the demand for a lown of five hundred millions of thalers has not met with success in spite of the benevolent assistance of the Times. It is evident that Prussia is not ready for the war, the difficulties about the Landwehr are by no means smoothed away, and large numbers of her men are deserting across the French frontiers

THE PRETENSIONS OF PRUSSIA.

An extract of a correspondence apparently semi-official in its origin, from Berlin, to the Gazette d'Augsburg, will give some ideas of the pretensions of BISMARCK and WILLIAM IV., in case of the victory of their arms.

"France not having as yet made known the limits of its pretensions, it does not become us to make known, just yet, what will be the exactions of Germany; what is certain, is that the question of nationalities will not be resolved until the French have been driven beyond the Vosges. The hour is not less solemn than when in 486 and 496, after the battles of Soissons and Tolbiac, CLOVIS destroyed on one side the Roman dominions in Gaul, and on the other brought into subjection the Alamans of the Rhenish Palatinate. Since this epoch, few combats have been of so great moment either in France or in Germany. It is true that Leipsic decided the fate of the Emperor of which who considered himself the successor of CHARLEMAGNE, but the question, inasmuch as it concerns the two people, remained unresolved, for France, vanquished, retained her frontiers more extended than in 1795, and this, without protestation on the part of Austria. The hour for resolving this question has struck."

A reward of $400 is offered to the first Prussian regiment which may take possession of a French mitrailleuse, and $150 for the first canon.

SKIRMISHES.

You will have received by cable, before this reaches you, the account of the first skirmish between the opposing armies. According to the Journal Officiel, the French, under Col. BERNIS, met and repulsed a Bavarian reconnoitreing party, killing one officer and taking two prisoners. Other French accounts state that the engagement was between a regiment of French and a regiment of Bavarians, the former charging, killing and wounding all the officers and taking several prisoners. According to Prussian accounts appearing in the English papers, the Prussians were the victors, and the number of killed and wounded must have been much more considerable.

FORMATION OF GUERILLA CORPS.

The American Register about a week ago announced that a certain number of our young countrymen, fired with military ambition, had made application to the French Government to form themselves into a corps, to be placed at the disposal of the Commander-in-Chief of the army. At first these advances were unfavorably received, but we find that an order was issued, yesterday, authorizing guerilla parties, each one to be composed of thirty picked men, belonging to good families, and noted for their skill as sharp-shooters. This morning's Gaulois tells us that the American legion spoken of a few days since has finally obtained permission to organize itself. It will be composed of 500 men, all Americans except the commander, who will be a French officer, appointed by the Minister of War, and under his direct orders. It will form a part of the corps of Franco-tireurs, (sharpshooters,) in course of organization, and which is so much counted on for its ability in the approaching campaign."

We are rather surprised, after the surfeit of soldiering from which our countrymen have so lately suffered, to find a "legion" with sufficient stomach for fighting to place itself at the disposal of a foreign Government. It is more particularly strange in this conflict, in which each nation maintains that it is the cause of liberty which is its especial aim. We may say, however, that the thing is a matter of taste, although we can but declare that the institution of guerrilla warfare is of most questionable morality, and calculated to lead to most deplorable results.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS FOR THE WAR.

A great part of the rolling material intended for the service of the Treasury and Post-office Departments attached to the army, was sent forward to the frontiers yesterday. It consisted chiefly of wagons, bearing the names of the different corps and divisions, and so constructed as to serve for an office. In front of the wagons are seats for the officials in charge. The uniform of the persons on this service is green, with silver facings. Each wagon is drawn by two horses, ridden by volunteers from the Garde Mobile. As a distinguishing mark they wear a red shoulder-band. In addition to these wagons are two-wheeled tilburys, similar to those in the Postal service in Paris for the carriage of mail-bags from one Post-office to another. These carriages are marked "The French Army," and beneath, "Department for the delivery of dispatches."

TORPEDOES IN THE RHINE, &C.

I learn from authentic sources that the Prussians have sunk a considerable number of torpedoes in the bed of the Rhine. In order to insure the success of the flotilla of gun-boats to be sent under the command of Admiral JULIAN DE LE GRAVRIE, it will be necessary first to destroy the wires connecting these terrible explosive engines with the Prussian shores. Sheares and diving-bells must, therefore, form a part of the war material on the Rhine as well as on the Baltic. The City of Cologne has just been put in a state of siege, and the Prussians have blown up the railway station. We learn from Hamburg, by the way of Munich, that the North German Lloyds will sail under the American flag.

RUMORS.

There is a rumor this afternoon that the Emperor left last night for Nancy, but nothing certain is known to the public. A council of Ministers was held at St. Cloud today, and from this might be inferred that His Majesty had not yet set out. The Empress, however, has full power to preside as Regent during the absence of the Emperor.

Just as I am on the point of concluding my letter, a most remarkable piece of information is brought to my knowledge, and as the source from which I obtain it is altogether reliable, I give the statement in full. M. BENEDETTI, the French Ambassador to the Court of Berlin, is convicted through official documents of having acted with not less duplicity and bad faith toward his Government than the Prussian diplomatist himself. M. BENEDETTI, it appears, was so strictly allied with the Rouher and La Vallette faction that he acted blindly according to their instructions, and actually went so far as to withhold his late note to the Prussian Government from the knowledge of the Duc DE GRAMMONT, the present Minister of Foreign Affairs, with the intention of making use of the ignorance of its existence on the part of the present Cabinet as a proof of its incapacity. Fortunately M. DE GRAMMONT was as well served in the end by openness in his diplomacy as ROUHER & Co. by their cunning. The note of M. BENEDETTI was made public, and the unworthy part he had taken in the transaction exposed. M. BENEDETTI is true to the traditions of treachery ascribed to his blood. He is a Corsican, or rather was born in Corsica, his mother being a native of that island. His father was a Greek, and filled the post of Consul-General of Austria at Cairo. He was brought up as a consular pupil, and obtained his first position at Palermo, and then continued a diplomatic career until he reached his present important and responsible post. It is not necessary to state that he will not be likely to obtain another ambassadorship. Prince NAPOLEON will, it is said, go to Copenhagen within a fortnight. The King of Denmark desires to remain neutral, but it is hardly probable that he will be able to resist the outbreak of popular enthusiasm which will be certain to take place upon his arrival in the Danish capital.

THE HOHENZOLLERN CANDIDATURE REVIVED.

A Toulouse journal, the Gazette de Languedoc, states that PRIM escorted Prince LEOPOLD of Hohenzollern, through their city, en route for the Spanish capital, only a few days ago. I have just heard it stated that Lieut.-Gen. PHIL SHERIDAN is expected soon to arrive in Paris, with the intention of accompanying the French Army to the Rhine. The Emperor is very decided in declaring that he will receive no foreign officers in his camps, so that it is probable that the distinguished abilities and great reputation of the General will not procure him the accomplishment of his wishes. The following are important opinions from Continental journals received this morning: The Cologne Gazette accuses the Emperor of declaring war against Prussia wholly and solely for the purpose of getting possession of the left bank of the Rhine. The new Military Gazette, (Vienna,) is in great hopes that the hour is not far distant when Austria will put herself at the head of Southern Germany and drive their oppressors, the Prussians, before them. The Presse, (Vienna,) calls attention to numerous manifestations in favor of neutrality throughout Austria. The Pagen Presse, (Vienna,) does not believe in the long duration of neutrality on the part of Austria. All depends on the attitude which will be assumed by Russia, the sympathies of the Cabinet in that country being well known to be in favor of Prussia. The Golos, (St. Petersburg liberal,) and the Moscow Gazette are very sympathetic for France. The Gazette de la Bourse, (St. Petersburg,) approves the attitude assumed by the Government in the preservation of a strict neutrality. The Perseverenza, (Italy,) gives an account of several revolutionary manifestations, amongst others of one which took place at Milan on the 24th, the people crying out "Viva la Republica! Morte a Napoleon!"

THE CAMP AT METZ.

On the Way from Paris—The Soldiers on the Move—Tribulations of Correspondents.

From Our Special Correspondent.

METZ, Wednesday, July 27, 1870.

If the official communications by means of which the French Government intends acquainting the nation with the victories of its army have not yet announced the firing of the first shot and the consequent commencement of the soldiers' hardships, the struggles of the war correspondents, at all events, have already begun. A score of journalists are stationed about the town awaiting events, and with a more slender chance of success in chronicling them than ever presented itself. Since no news is to be gotten for the present, at any rate, I propose to review the circumstances attending a correspondent's departure for the frontier, and his sojourn here.

"FROM PARIS TO BERLIN."

An accomplished and genial French journalist has given the title printed above to the series of letters he has just opened under the same dateline covering this summary of incidents. Metz, of course, he designates as the first station of the road, which if traveled at all, will be found a hard one. Upward of two hundred thousand men, however, have reached this first station, passing, after departure from all points of France, through the Eastern Depot in Paris. For days and nights, the route has been crowded with troops and covered with wagons heavy with the dread apparatus of war.

The cars have not been cleansed for a week, the rails have been loosened by over-freighted trains, brisk and polite employes have become dispirited and brutal, and all because of the excessive traffic. Out of eight persons in a first-class compartment, six are officers and soldiers. In the third-class carriages and in the cattle vans are piled hundreds of reserve men, in soiled canvas shirts and with faces black with dust. In vast coops on wheels in the rear are the horses intended for the artillery, and behind these on rough platforms on wheels are field-pieces, and the terrible mitrailleuses, with breeches muffled in oil-cloth. On the way the din is terrific. The officers seek to quiet the men, but patriotic individuals insist on stopping the train at every village, and there the traveling heroes are plied with claret and fevered with cheers. The rough reserve troops are as boisterous and as boasting as the chiefs in the adjoining coupé are tranquil and modest. But it is fair to say that with each military detachment in a first-class wagon is to be found a peaceable citizen who acts the Bobadil for the party. Nothing can exceed in vaunting insolence the French tax-payer, who travels with a half-dozen officers, and seeks to be agreeable to them. He revises history for the benefit of the morale of modern France, and describes Prussian sentiment and estimates Prussian strength with an infallibility of manner the Pope himself would envy. The gods before whom this incense is burned say little, and several of them seem little gratified at a swinging of the censer with such enthusiasm as to make (according to a Gallicism) a breaking of it against their heads, a matter of imminence. The soldier, in fact, knows nothing of the situation, except that forty-eight hours previous he has received orders to proceed to Metz, or to Thionville, or to Nancy, or to Bitsche, and that a paper entitling him to rail transportation thither has accompanied the call. He smokes incessantly, eats whenever the opportunity of doing so arises, and now and then drops into a doze. A more courteous companion for a twelve hours' ride from Paris to the frontier could not be wanted, but one more enlightened on the position of affairs, and a trifle less smooth in his speech, would be more acceptable.

CORRESPONDENTS' CAMP.

Metz, as noted already, is at present a veritable correspondents' camp. Three or four English writers are about with the correspondent of the Times, and twelve or fifteen French journalists. Misery loves company, and the American representative is put in memory of this saying by the tidings that all his co-laborers are as ill-provided for as himself in respect of facilities. The art which, according to Dogberry in the play, comes by nature, has not been bestowed upon all French sentinels, and if all of them do read, a very few could be expected to understand the tenor of a passport or the significance of the American eagle shading a splendidly inaccurate personal description of the bearer under its wings. And no permit to accompany the army has been granted or will be granted to any one. Minister OLLIVIER has been tracked, Gen. LEBŒUF has been persecuted, but in vain. The large fish and the small fry have been alike stopped by the net dividing the hotels at which the chroniclers are sojourning from the camp beyond. Nothing is to be done. The Englishmen hire superb specimens of anatomy, let out as horses, and ride about the environs. The Frenchmen obtain unlimited supplies of beer, and seating themselves in front of thronged cafés invent the amusing anecdotes. A string of these, ended with a pun, constitutes that stirring war correspondence of the Paris papers, to the publication of which I may as well note here Minister OLLIVIER has just put a stop. The American correspondent meanwhile seeks out Marshal BAZAINE with a view to making a final effort. He does not reach the Marshal, but his nephew and aid, whose face is bronzed by a five years' exposure to the sun of Mexico. M. BAZAINE is very polite but very firm. He cannot assist in any way the correspondents of the different nations at Metz or elsewhere. No writer has been allowed to follow the troops, though MEISSONIER and YVON, the battle-painters of the Empire, and several artists of the historical papers have been accorded some privileges in that respect. And no reversal of this decision can be expected.

THIRSTING FOR NEWS.

Of what is occurring on the frontier, but a few miles distant, everybody in Metz is naturally as ignorant as if the army were manœuvring in Australia. So the American correspondent decides upon pushing to the front and learning de visu the condition—the partial condition, at any rate—of affairs. An immense display of eloquence and a deposit of one hundred francs secures a horse and a set of harness of the most primitive description. A little place called Bombay is about four hours distant, and thitherward the American correspondent, leaving his French companions in active pursuit of the warlike bon mot, directs his movements. The heat is terrific. Right and left are green fields, studded with fly-tents, under and about which are stretched soldiers sleeping in happy heedlessness of the morrow. It is afternoon, but the recall is being beaten when I reach Boulay, and the bugles are sounding in unison on all sides. It is a village of about two thousand inhabitants, but fully ten or twelve thousand men are in its streets at present, and the correspondent's horse, whose intelligence seems to be equal to its thinness, really displays almost human prudence in avoiding to tread upon the bodies of men slumbering in the dusty and crooked lanes. An inn with a sign-board indicating the landlord's willingness to lodge men "on foot and on horseback," is at the extremity of the main thoroughfare, and there the correspondent must pass the night. The common room, where a table is being laid with about twenty covers, is filled with soldiers and peasants. Soup has just been served, when the writer is summoned into the entry, where two gendarmes, somewhat more dignified in physical appearance but not a whit more intelligent than the typical persons in "Geneviéve de Brabant" inquire into his business, and imprint the marks of dirty finger upon the engraving reproducing the American eagle. Dinner ended, the correspondent is shown to a room, where, after locking the door, he sits himself at a table to write. One hour goes by, and a thundering knock startles him out of his propriety, and into an exclamation of more than French energy. He opens the door, and the gendarmes reappear, in company with a short, stout gentleman, whom his words, and before he speaks, his tri-colored sash—designate as the Mayor. The document already displayed is subjected to fresh manipulation, and is rendered perceptibly weightier by additional digital impressions. No remarks are made in presence of the subject of the passport, but as the Mayor, in spite of apologies for disturbing him, wears a rather ominous expression on his countenance, the gendarmes scowl as they leave. A third and final visit is confidently looked for, and, in view of possible results, the journalist buckles his small valise. It comes, twenty minutes later, with an accompaniment of peasants. The Mayor and the gendarmes reappear, and the village monarch proclaims that the respected correspondent—whose newspaper, he doubts not, has always shown itself most sympathetic to France and to the Imperial dynasty—must depart. Argument, of course, is useless, and the journalist, avoiding it, goes. He returns to Metz by daybreak, and having narrated his experience to the French journalists—who have, meantime, gotten up a sufficient number of witty and patriotic morsels to flood France withal so soon as Minister OLLIVIER withdraws his interdiction of the publication of war news—he sees notes of it taken that warrant him in the belief that his name will be misspelt and his adventure exaggerated all over France as soon as the printing of tidings of army movements is reauthorized.

IGNORANCE AND BLISS.

The people of France, and—what is of greater concern to the correspondent—the people of the United States, will have ample opportunity during the present war of ascertaining whether or no ignorance is bliss. It can be stated with absolute assurance that no particle of news will be obtained from the Emperor's army except such crumbs of it as may be permitted to fall from the official baskets. The Prussians, fortunately, more reliant upon the stability of the feeling at home, have given all writers the widest latitude. Hence you may await facts from the one side with almost as much surety of learning the truth as there is now uncertainty as to the amount of faith to be place in stories from the Empire. That all means are being used to stifle alike attempts at description, at gathering intelligence, and at discussing the question, is to be arrived at by taking into account one incident. While the writer of these lines was at Metz with an associate, (both unknown, as they imagined, to the central authorities,) their co-laborer in Paris, on visiting the Ministry of the Interior, was told their names, their movements and their probable intentions—the latter, be it said, being very neatly guessed at. A caution as to prudence, couched in terms of friendship, but as significant as need be, accompanied the information.

THE SECRET TREATY.

M. Ollivier's Unofficial Statement—Further Comments of the London Press.

The following is the letter of M. EMILE OLLIVIER to a friend in England on the publication of the proposed secret treaty between France and Prussia, which has been referred to in our cable dispatches:

PARIS, July 26, 1870.

MY DEAR FRIEND: How could you believe there was any truth in the treaty the Times has published? I assure you that the Cabinet of the 2d of January never negociated or concluded anything of the kind with Prussia.

I will even tell you that it has negotiated nothing at all with her. The only negotiations that have existed between us have been indirect, confidential, and had Lord CLARENDON for their intermediary. Since Mr. GLADSTONE slightly raised the vail in one of his speeches, we may allow ourselves to say that the object of those negotiations so honorable to Lord CLARENDON, was to assure the peace of Europe by a reciprocal disarmament. You will admit that this does not much resemble the conduct of ministers who seek a pretext for war.

You know the value I set upon the confidence and friendship of the great English nation. The union of the two countries has always seemed to me the most essential condition of the world's progress. And for that reason I earnestly beg you to contradict all those false reports spread by persons who have an interest in dividing us.

We have no secret policy hidden behind our avowed policy. Our policy is single, public, loyal, without after-thoughts (arrières pensées;) we do not belong to the school of those who think force is superior to right; we believe, on the contrary, that good right will always prevail in the end; and it is because the right is on our side in the war now beginning that, with the help of God, we reckon upon victory.

Affectionate salutations from your servant.

(Signed,) EMILE OLLIVIER.

The London journals of the 27th and 28th contain further comments on the subject of the projected treaty. The Times says it is too plain that we have not got the whole truth, nor reached the end of the business. The authenticity of the treaty is admitted on both sides. So much, once for all, is certain, but there are discrepancies in the accounts of the origin and degree of importance attached to the proposed Convention. Upon these subjects much more must be told and weighed before anything like certainty can be attained. The Telegraph has no wish to assume the truth of this extraordinary document, and it will only do so with the utmost reluctance and most heartfelt regret; but common fairness bids it admit that the interval which has passed since it wrote last has tended rather to remove than confirm its doubts as to its authenticity. The Post expresses its opinion that the treaty is the handiwork of BISMARCK. The Standard thinks the treaty is now proved to be what it stated on Tuesday—a clumsy but most malicious forgery. While denying that the proposals have been addressed by the French Government to Berlin as a compromise of the present difficulty, it attacks the Times for doing all that is possible to involve England in war, and to guarantee as genuine Prussian forgeries. The Daily News considers that so far as Prussia is concerned the minute is attested, but not explained; the French Government, on the other hand, have both attested and explained it. But, on any explanation, they are both guilty of entertaining hostile projects under the cover of friendly professions, and the Daily News is not quite sure that as the matter stands there is much to choose between them. The Paris correspondent of the Telegraph affirms that the projected treaty was proposed to France by Prussia. The Duke DE GRAMMONT utterly denies that France ever thought of the annexation of Belgium.

THE HOHENZOLLERN BUSINESS.

M. de Grammont's Last Circular—The Question a Matter of Veracity Between Herr Von Thile and M. Benedetti.

The Journal Officiel contains a further circular from M. DE GRAMMONT respecting the Hohenzollern business which reduces the question to a matter of veracity between HERR VON THILE and M. BENEDETTI. This document is as follows:

PARIS, July 24.

MONSIEUR: The Cabinet of Berlin has published, relative to the negotiations at Ems, various documents, in the number of which is a dispatch from Baron DE WERTHER giving an account of a conversation we had together during his last stay in this capital. These papers do not present the veritable aspect of the course pursued by the Emperor's Government under these circumstances, and the report of M. DE WERTHER, especially, attributes words to me which I believe my duty requires me to rectify on several points. The Ambassador of Prussia, in our interview, dwelt particularly on this consideration, that the King, in authorizing the candidature of Prince DE HOHENZOLLERN, had never had any intention of wounding the Emperor, and had never supposed that this combination could give umbrage to France. I observed to my interlocutor that, if such was the case, a similar assurance given would be of a nature to facilitate the accord we were seeking. But I did not ask that the King should write a letter of excuse as the Berlin journals have pretended in their semi-official commentaries. Nor can I subscribe to the observations which the Baron attributes to me on the subject of the declaration of the 6th July. I did not admit that this manifestation had been determined by Parliamentary necessities. I explained our language by the sharpness of the wound we had received, and I in no way put forward the personal position of the Ministers as the motive determining their conduct. What I said was that no Cabinet could preserve in France the confidence of the Chambers and public opinion in consenting to an arrangement which did not contain a serious guarantee for the future. I must add, contrary to the recital of M. DE WERTHER, that I made no distinction between the Emperor and France. Nothing in my language could authorize the representative of Prussia to suppose that a strict solidarity of impressions did not prevail between the Sovereign and the whole nation. Those reserves made, I arrive at the principal reproach made against us by the Cabinet of Berlin. We are said to have voluntarily opened the discussion with the King of Prussia, instead of with his Government. But when on the 4th July, in accordance with my instructions, our Chargé d'Affaires called upon Count DE THILE to speak to him of the news we had received from Spain, what was the language of the Secretary of State? According to his own expression, "the Prussian Government was completely ignorant of this affair, which did not exist for it." In presence of the attitude of the Cabinet, which affected to have nothing to do with the incident, and to consider it as solely regarding the Prussian Royal Family, what could we do except to apply to the King himself? It is thus that against our will, we requested our Ambassador to place himself in communication with the Sovereign, instead of treating with his Minister. I have resided long enough in the Courts of Europe to know how disadvantageous that mode of communication is, and all the Cabinets will put faith in my words when I affirm that we only pursued that path because all others were closed to us. We regret that Count DE BISMARCK, as soon as he was aware of the gravity of the affair, had not gone to Ems to resume his natural position as intermediary between the King and our Ambassador; but are we in reality responsible for the isolation in which His Majesty doubtless desired to remain, and which the Chancellor probably found favorable to his designs? And if, as the Cabinet of Berlin states, the declaration of war remitted by our Chargé d'Affaires constitutes our first written and official communication, whose is the fault? Are notes addressed to sovereigns? Could our Ambassador so far derogate from customary usages when he was treating with the King, and is not the absence of any document exchanged between the two Governments the necessary consequence of the obligation under which we were placed to pursue the discussion at Ems, instead of continuing it at Berlin, where we had first raised it? Before closing these rectifications I must refer to one observation of the Prussian Cabinet. According to a telegram from Berlin, published by the journals of the 23d, MM. DE BISMARCK and DE THILE, contesting a passage in my circular dispatch of the 21st of July, declared that "since the day they heard of the offer addressed to the Prince DE HOHENZOLLERN, the question of that candidature to the throne of Spain has never been the subject of the least conversation, either official or private, between themselves and M. BENEDETTI." In the form in which it is produced this affirmation is ambiguous; it seems to refer solely to the relations of our Ambassador with the Prussian Ministry posterior to the acceptance of Prince LEOPOLD. In that sense it would not be contrary to what we have ourselves said; but if it is extended to anterior communications it ceases to be true, and to establish that fact I cannot do better than cite here a dispatch dated March 31, 1869, addressed by Count BENEDETTI to the Marquis DE LAVALETTE, then Minister of Foreign Affairs. It is thus conceived:

BERLIN, March 31.

MONSIEUR LE MARQUIS: Your Excellency requested me by telegraph, yesterday, to assure myself whether the candidature of Prince DE HOHENZOLLERN to the throne of Spain had a serious character. I had occasion this morning to see M. DE THILE, and I asked him if I was to attach any importance to the rumors in circulation on this subject. I did not conceal from him that I was anxious to be exactly informed, remarking that such an eventuality was of too direct interest to the Emperor's Government for my duty not to compel me to point out the danger if any reason existed to believe that the project might be realized. I made him aware that I intended to communicate our conversation to you. M. DE THILE gave me the most formal assurance that he had not at any moment been aware of any indication whatever which could authorize a similar conjecture, and that the Spanish Minister at Vienna, during the stay he made in Berlin, had not even made any allusion to the subject. The Under Secretary of State, in thus expressing himself, and without anything I said being of a nature to induce such a manifestation, believed himself called upon to pledge his word of honor. According to him, M. RANCES had confined himself to talking to Count DE BISMARCK—who perhaps was anxious to take advantage of the passage of this diplomatist to obtain some information on the state of things in Spain—of the manner in which affairs were advancing in what concerned the choice of the future Sovereign. That, in substance, is what M. DE THILE stated to me, several times repeating his first declaration, that there was not, and could not be, a question of the Prince DE HOHENZOLLERN for the crown of Spain. Accept, &c.

BENEDETTI.

After this quotation, I believe I have no occasion to enter into any further explanations on a point we must consider as definitively established.

WAR NOTES.

A Paris journal, Le Soir, says that Marshal MCMAHON'S corps d'armée have been practising lately at "hasty entrenchment" work. Five hundred men in line formed a parapet and trench 500 yards in length by one and a half yards in depth in less than ten minutes.

The London Daily News, of July 24, says: A large number of very fine and hardy horses are daily reaching Liverpool from several of the Irish ports, and from their excellent condition as regards bone, sinew and wind, it is quite evident that the French horse-buyers in Ireland are not bad judges of animals suitable for hard work. A good number look as if they were intended for the artillery service; but the majority, among which were a few splendid high-bred horses, are no doubt required for cavalry purposes. The people in charge of the horses were somewhat "doubtful" as to which port the horses would embark for France. A Southampton dispatch says a large number of horses have left the docks there for French ports.

A preliminary meeting was held in London on the 23d inst., of the Central Committee for the relief of the sick and wounded. It was resolved that the Committee should be organized to act in concert with the Société International de Secours pour les Militaires Blessées, and that a deputation should wait on Lord GRANVILLE, requesting him to communicate on the subject with the Prussian and French authorities through the respective ambassadors of those countries. It was stated that the Prince of WALES is willing to act as President.

The Official Journal of Petersburg of the 24th ult., contains the following: "The Imperial Russian Government has made all possible endeavors to avert the outbreak of war. Unfortunately the rapidity with which the warlike resolutions were taken rendered our efforts for the maintenance of peace abortive. The Emperor is resolved to observe neutrality, so long as Russia's interests are not affected by the eventualities of the campaign. The Russian Government undertakes to support every endeavor to circumscribe the operations and diminish the duration of the war."

The following is given as the correct version of the Emperor NAPOLEON'S proclamation to the fleet, which the Empress read from the quarter-deck of the flag-ship on the occasion of her recent visit to the sailors:

OFFICERS AND SAILORS: Although I shall not be in the midst of you, my hopes and wishes will be with you in all those seas in which your valor is about to be displayed. The French Navy has glorious recollections, and will show herself worthy of her past history. Although you may be far distant from your native soil, think when face to face with the enemy that France is with you—that her heart beats in unison with yours, and that she invokes upon your arms the protection of Heaven. While you are fighting on the seas your brothers in arms upon the land are striving with equal ardor for the same cause as your own. Assist reciprocally one another's actions, and your efforts will be crowned with success. Go, gentlemen, and display with just pride our national colors. In seeing the tri-color flag floating over our ships, the enemy will know that it carries in its folds the honor and the genius of France.

NAPOLEON.

PALAIS DE SAINT CLOUD, 23d July, 1870.

The Crown Prince of Prussia, having communicated to the South German sovereigns his appointment as Commander-in-Chief of their armies, has received from each of them a congratulatory message expressing their satisfaction. The King of Bavaria is "very happy," and thanks the Prince for his attention. The King of Wurtemburg rejoices, "in our German affair," to have the opportunity of saluting his Royal Highness, and begs the Prince to notify his arrival. The Grand Duke of Baden says the nomination of the Prince fills him and his troops with joy, and they hope to gain his Royal Highness's confidence by their fidelity and bravery. The Grand Duke thus concludes: "We await with joy the arrival of your Royal Highness. Long live the King—long live the Fatherland!"

"I am reliably informed," says a correspondent, writing from Paris, "that the fortifications of Paris are to be placed in a state of defense with the utmost dispatch. Most of your readers have seen them. You know that Paris is surrounded first by a chain of detached forts, and next by a continuous series of bastions with ditch and glacis. Some of the forts are already in a state of defense, but the enciente continué is not. What has to be done is this: the parapet has to be protected by gabions and fasoines; embrasures have to be cut, platforms constructed, and ordnance mounted. Marshal NIEL wanted to have this done in 1867, but he was overruled. Next the ditch, which is interrupted by the road at every gate of the city, has to be cut across it; draw-bridges will have to be provided, and probably a tambour, i. e., a kind of field-work, built in front. The announcement that this was to be done forthwith has caused no small excitement. It is, however, no harm that the Parisians should be made to know that there are realities in war beyond mere shouting on the boulevards. The National Guard will have to take its turn of duty on the fortifications—be put through their drill, &c. The works are to be carried, on I believe, I have already told you, under the superintendence of Gen. COUNT DE CHABAUD LATOUR, of the Engineers. The arming of the fortifications will be a gigantic undertaking. I cannot imagine its being done under a year's time. The enciente continué laid out in a straight line would be about eighteen miles in length."

The special correspondent of the Standard at Metz says: "Apropos of the forts, two spies have been arrested in the act of taking observations of them—genuine spies this time, not Britishers or officers. A third, who had tried to pass the sentry in disguise of a priest immersed in the pages of his breviary, escaped. The sentry challenged him. 'On ne passe pas ici M. l'Abbe.' 'My son,' said the pseudo priest, 'your orders are to forbid civilians and military to pass—I am neither; the consigne does not regard me.' 'Shan't pass, all the same,' cried the sentry. The reverend gentleman showed a purse to the soldier, which confirmed the latter in the suspicion he had a spy to deal with. He could not leave his post, but he raised the alarm; the mock priest took leg-ball, as if he were a Deerfoot in cassock, jumped into a carriage which was waiting for him round a corner, and was whipped away before a couple of cavalry troopers could mount and give chase."

The angry, not to say furious, tone adopted by nearly all the Paris Press toward their opponents in the present war is strongly evidenced by M. EDMOND ABOUT, writing to the Soir from Strasburg, says: "We are told that the Prussians are quite scandalized to hear that we are about to launch against them those fine African troops the Turcos. 'The French,' they say, 'want us to be eaten up by savages.' It remains to be seen whether these savages are not infinitely more civilized than the barbarians who are encamped at Kehl. The noble bridge which France had constructed at a common cost has been partly demolished, and is injured throughout its whole structure. Never was a less excusable instance of stupidity presented to the Europe of the nineteenth century. If Prussia is not made to pay to the last centime the cost occasioned by its brutal cowardice, it will be that justice does not exist in this world or in the other. I hear it said that the soldiers of the Landwehr—those weeping tailors and shoe-makers who are packed off by force to seek for glory—have a great fear of the bayonet-gun. They are only half reassured by an exaggerated statement of the power of the needle-gun, and by being told that our soldiers will never have an opportunity of applying the cold steel. Let us compassionate the poor wretches who rely upon the faith of this chimera."

The conflict between France and Prussia makes it interesting to compare the relative resources of the two countries. France is considerably larger than the Confederation, not only in territory but in population, for the last census gave the numbers as 38,000,000 Frenchmen against 26,000,000 Prussians. In France, however, the normal rate of increase in population is very slow, 160 years being the time occupied in doubling the number, while Prussia takes but forty-two years. In financial matters the advantage is on the side of Prussia, whose Budget has never been very heavy. The incidence of taxation in Prussia may be put down as about one pound a head, while in France it is nearly two pounds. The national debt of Prussia is barely two pounds a head, while France has to pay interest on fifteen pounds a head. In one case the interest is £2,000,000; in the other it is no less than £24,000,000. France excels Prussia in her economic position. The commerce of France is greater than that of Prussia, and it has been computed that while the annual income of each Prussian is £22 per head, that of the Frenchman is £27. Prussia, however, is in advance of France, and in fact of all the European States, as far as education is concerned.

A correspondent of the Birmingham Gazette writes: "Surprise is expressed in all quarters at Mr. CARDWELL'S decision, or rather indecision, in so vital a matter as a reserve of breech-loaders. I learn that the inquiries from neutral Continental Powers as to the number of guns in the hands of private makers have been manifold; and I further know that most of the large gun-makers delayed replying to these inquiries until Government was consulted. Well, Government has been consulted, and the formal stereotyped answer is, 'At present your services are not required.' One large contract from Russia is now being executed in this country, and Holland and Belgium are both in the English market for arms. Of course, 'for the present,' the gun-making trade of this country will not stand still, but will undoubtedly fill their houses with foreign orders, and then woe to Mr. CARDWELL and his clique should he be forced into the market to buy."

Shooting Affair in Seventh-Avenue.

A number of negroes were standing at the corner of Thirtieth-street and Seventh-avenue, last evening, when SAM THOMPSON alias Brown fired a pistol at JOHN GARRISON, the ball taking effect in the neck and inflicting a dangerous wound. THOMPSON was arrested and locked up in the Thirtieth-street Police Station. The wounded man was properly cared for.

THREE-CARD MONTE.

How the Unsophisticated are Fleeced at Coney Island—The Tricks of the Game—How to Put an End to It.

Our most convenient sea-side resort has for many years been overrun to a deplorable extent by the unprincipled class in the community who support an existence—which the rest of the world could do very well without—by exercising their wits, often of no contemptible keenness, upon their more honest and decent, if more stupid fellow-creatures. Of all the human blood-suckers which infest that locality, none thrive better than the "three-card-monte men." A visitor in passing from the steam-boat landing to the most frequented portion of the beach, will invariably encounter several small groups of men, in the centre of which a glib-tongued cut-throat stands at a little table, upon which are placed three cards. Two of these are either ordinary playing-cards, or have plain engraved pictures on them, while the third, or winning card, is ornamented with a colored picture. If the passer by has the curiosity to watch the game, he finds the eloquent ruffian exhibiting these cards, and informing the crowd that "This card, you observe, wins; either of the other two loses; now watch closely while I pass them over each other in this manner; now I will bet $10 that no one can tell which is the picture card." Everyone who sees him throw the cards from between his thumbs and fingers, and deliberately pass them one over the other two or three times, feels perfectly sure that he can pick up the winning card and probably the first time he bets he will succeed, for it is the intention of the player that he shall do so, but having won once or twice, the stakes being generally doubled each time, he suddenly turns up the wrong card, the sharper having made up his mind at that particular point that he shall lose. Apparently the cards were thrown down in the same way as before, but of course, two of the three cards are held in one hand and the player very deftly thro

A crib, forty feet in height, and 900 tons weight, was successfully launched at Cleveland, Ohio, last week. It is pentagonal in shape, each of its sides being fifty-four feet in length, with a circumference of 270 feet. It is to be placed over the shaft at the outer end of the Water Works tunnel.

On the 6th inst., an injured husband at Syracuse attempted to take the life of his wife's paramour. Having found the man at his house, he fired at him three times, but none of the bullets took effect. No arrest was made. There was quite a commotion created in the street where the shooting occurred.

A young gentleman of Buffalo went to serenade his lady-love the other night, and while in the act of singing the first verse of the beautiful ballad "I'm dreaming, love, of thee" was suddenly "awakened" by the contents of a tub of cold water from a third story window. He didn't continue the song.

The authorities of Richmond, Va., have recently been making important improvements in the organization of the Police force of that city. Officers are required to be neat in person, not to smoke, drink, carry canes or umbrellas while on duty, and to make themselves familiar with the appearance of every person residing in their several districts.

MICHAEL BROWN, a resident of Cambridge, Ind., went to Connersville in that State, last week, for the purpose of being married to a Miss CATHARINE FLANEGAN. While the preparations for the ceremony were in progress, he suddenly complained of illness, and died at 9 o'clock on the same night. Verily, "in the midst of life we are in death."

Two children, named TUBBS and SCHERMERHORN, male and female, neither above the age of six years, eloped from Hudson, Michigan, last week, and had reached the town of Osseo, several miles distant, before they were discovered on a train, and locked up to await the arrival of their parents. The aggregate deposits received during two years were $180,000, and the drafts $118,000, leaving a balance due to depositors of $62,000.

A farmer, named GRAY, attempted to stop the trains on the Springfield and Illinois Southeastern Railroad, some time since, by building a rail fence across the track to keep the hogs out of his grain. The road runs through GRAY'S farm, and he adopted the rail fence system as the guard was not sufficient. The first train up ran against the fence and was thrown from the track. GRAY was arrested and held for trial.

A guest of one of the hotels in Montgomery, Ala., was awakened by the flies a few days since, to find that his new set of false teeth had been stolen. When breakfast was announced he was unable to eat; but his annoyance was not complete until a young lady called to make him a visit. He could not find courage enough to see her with such an altered appearance. This is the first genuine case we have ever heard of where a man has been obliged to chew the cud of disappointment without teeth.

A match "game" of horse-shoeing for $200 a side came off at Cincinnati, Ohio, on Friday last, between two brawny sons of Vulcan in that city, named JOHN BAYNE and EDWARD O'DONNELL, the latter a native of New-York. The men concluded their work at the same moment, but O'DONNELL was accorded the championship for superior skill.

Mrs. HENRIETTA E. BEDFORD, a resident of St. Louis, Mo., has filed a petition in the Circuit Court of that city, which sets forth that she is an infant of the age of seventeen years, and wishes to procure a divorce from her husband, to whom she has been married since May, 1869, but who deserted her in two months afterward, and had since declined to support her. Her maiden name was MAN, but considering the experience she has had of a "man," we should think that she would naturally have an abhorrence of the name.

TERENCE MCDONALD and JAMES MCCARTHY, both farmers, and residents of Dakota County, near West St. Paul, Minn., quarreled about hogs one day last week, until Mrs. MCCARTHY ordered out the shot gun, the sight of which made the men, if possible, more belligerent. MCCARTHY finally seized the weapon and discharged the contents of the two barrels into the body of his opponent, without appearing to do him serious injury. As a rule, when men quarrel about hogs they are almost sure to resort to "brute" force before their angry passions have been appeased.

Dangerous Pets—A "Snake-Charmer" Fatally Bitten.

A man by the name of ROBERTS, living on the mountains near Boston Corners, on the line of the Harlem Railroad, caught a very large rattle-snake with his hands a few days ago, and took it to the Station, where he exhibited it to the people of the neighborhood, by picking it up and handling it in such a way as to make the reptile show its teeth, &c., on payment of ten cents by each spectator. During one of these exhibitions the snake bit one of ROBERTS' fingers and again, when picking it up it struck its fangs in his hand and hung so fast that he took his cane and knocked it off and killed it. This was about 3 o'clock P. M., and about 4½ o'clock ROBERTS was suffering excruciating pain. His body swelled very much, and, it is said, became spotted like the snake and his tongue turned black. He died from the effects of the bite the following morning. In the neighborhood of Boston Corners this man ROBERTS has had the reputation of being "a snake charmer." It is said that he has been bitten on several previous occasions when handling them as he did this time, without suffering any serious consequences from doing so.

POLICE TRIALS.

Results of the System of Grand Rounds—More Frivolous Charges.

Commissioner BOSWORTH was compelled to endure the foetid atmosphere of the crowded Court-room at Police Head-quarters for some hours yesterday, in consequence of the peculiar ability of the general roundsmen in bringing forward patrolmen to answer to frivolous complaints. Some of these officials are becoming inoculated with a little common sense and decency by the castigations which they have received in open Court at the hands of the Commissioners. Roundsman MCARTHUR has especially profited by such experience, and all of his cases yesterday were founded on actual derelictions of sufficient gravity to deserve rebuke, if not punishment. On the other hand, some of the officers who have hitherto been fair seem determined to emulate his former policy. Roundsman DOUGLASS made a complaint against Officer HIRAM COLE, of the Twenty-sixth Precinct, for standing in conversation with the keeper of the City Hall while he was on patrol in City Hall Park. Mr. ROOME came forward and testified that he went out and accosted COLE, calling his attention to the boys intruding upon the new grass-plots and requesting him to keep them off; the whole conversation, he said, could not have occupied more than five minutes; but COLE will probably be rewarded with a serious fine. Roundsman BEDDINGTON, however, did better than this in a complaint against MICHAEL KELLY, of the Twentieth Precinct, for sitting down on post. KELLY testified that he was taken very sick; that when BUDDINGTON came up he immediately addressed him, saying he was ill, and requesting him to assist him to the Station-house, which he did, and KELLY was excused from duty by the Sergeant on account of sickness. Roundsman MCGLOYN made a complaint, which was partially tried last week, against Patrolman PHILIP LAMBRECHT, of the Nineteenth Precinct, for beating a so-called "boy" named HENRY WEISNER, who is a stalwart youth of twenty years. All the facts having been developed yesterday, it appears that WEISNER, with a number of other young ruffians, known as "picnic strikers," intruded upon a picnic at Landman's Park, crowded the ladies off the dancing platform, knocking several of them down, and LAMBRECHT, who was on duty there, was called upon to preserve the peace, and ran several gangs out of the park, in return for which they began throwing stones from the outside at him and among the women in the Park. All this, MCGLOYN, who was in citizen's dress, witnessed, but did not offer to assist in quelling the disturbance and protecting the peaceable citizens from the ruffians. LAMBRECHT rushed out, pistol in hand, among the miscreants, and seized WEISNER, whom he had seen throw a stone, and MCGLOYN then for the first time interfered, but it was in behalf of the law-breakers by accusing LAMBRECHT of beating WEISNER without cause, and, it is alleged, by attempting indirectly to rescue the prisoner. By his wrangle with LAMBRECHT, on what he called his ill-usage of the prisoner, MCGLOYN certainly gave encouragement to the rioters, but LAMBRECHT nevertheless managed to retain his prisoner, who, next day, was arraigned before a Police Magistrate, and as he admits, was required to give bail in $300 for his good behavior. MCGLOYN, who also claims that he was insulted in the Station-house, then made the complaint, but when LAMBRECHT desired to make a complaint against MCGLOYN for cowardice, in neglecting to assist in quelling the disturbance, the officials at Police Headquarters refused to entertain it.

Divorce Granted.

The case of ELIZABETH J. ROUX vs. FREDERICK E. ROUX, the particulars of which have recently appeared in the TIMES, came on for trial yesterday in the Supreme Court Circuit before Judge CARDOZO and a jury. From the fact that great preparations had been made on the part of the defense, and also that a struck jury had been summoned by the Sheriff at the instance of one of the parties, it was believed that the trial would be a long and important one. The reverse of that, however, was the case. Only two or three witnesses were examined. The trial occupied but a few minutes, the counsel for the defendant having apparently abandoned the case. The testimony given tended to show that the parties to the suit were married in September, 1865; that the two resided with the bride's father until February, 1866; that afterward the twojwent to one of the Western States, and, during the trip, all their baggage was lost; that soon afterward the husband managed to collect the sum of about $4,000, the alleged value of the lost baggage, which he spent.

The main questions submitted to the jury, for their consideration, were whether the defendant committed adultery with one JENNIE WILLARD, at No. 5 Crosby-street, in the months of June and July, 1867, and in July, 1868, at the house No. 65 West Twenty-fifth-street, with a female whose name is unknown. The jury, from the evidence, found in the affirmative on both counts, and a decree of divorce in favor of the plaintiff was accordingly directed to be entered. Some evidence was also given to the effect that during the cohabitation the defendant had frequently very violent fits of rage which the plaintiff said rendered it quite improper and unsafe for her to live with him as his wife.

The Elm Park Riot and the New-York Caledonian Club—A Letter from the Vice-President.

CALEDONIAN CLUB HOUSE, }
No. 118 SULLIVAN-STREET, Aug. 3, 1870. }

To the Editor of the New-York Times:

In the New-York Herald of Monday, July 25, a communication was published over the name of ALEXANDER F. IRVING, relating to the late riot at Elm Park.

At the regular monthly meeting of this Club, held Aug. 2, its attention was called to the fact that said letter was dated from the Caledonian Club-house, and the Corresponding Secretary was instructed to make public disavowal of the Club's sanction of this liberty taken, which to the casual reader might appear as having been official. Doubtless with a view to securing the publication of said article, the writer has used the name of the Club unwarrantably for this purpose—thereby rendering himself amenable to expulsion from membership in the Club.

As Scotsmen in America, we have no association with any party whose constitution is based on either political or religious creed, and both are debarred from our Club. The only object of the Club is to foster and perpetuate a remembrance of the games, costume and literature of Scotland; and no member has a right by mere personal responsibility to assume the representation of the Club by word or by deed, either directly or indirectly.

By order of the Club,
GEORGE GILLULY, Vice-President.
L. D. ROBERTSON, Corresponding Secretary.

REAL ESTATE TRANSACTIONS.

The Exchange yesterday was quiet, no sales taking place. E. F. RAYMOND was to have sold, by order of the Supreme Court, six lots on One Hundred and Thirty-third-street, but the sale was postponed for two weeks. No property is advertised for today, and from appearances, the present week will resemble the last—little business, if any, being transacted. To-morrow JOHNSON & MILLER'S New-Brunswick sale takes place, and bids fair to be well attended. The property is desirable, and the lots should bring good prices.

THE QUEEN'S CUP RACE.

The Prize Carried Away by the Magic.

Brilliant Spectacle in the Lower Bay.

Large Attendance of Spectators — Fine Display of Yachts — The Cambria Beaten by the Dauntless and America —Full Account of the Contest.

The great yacht-race for the possession of the celebrated Queen's Cup, which has been looked forward to with intense interest for several weeks, took place in the Lower Bay, yesterday, and was probably the most exciting and splendid nautical spectacle that has ever been witnessed here, exceeding, as it did, the most sanguine expectations of yachtmen. The contest was probably attended by more public and wide-spread enthusiasm than any American sporting event that has ever occurred, either on land or water. As early as 8 o'clock in the morning the streets in the vicinity of the East and North Rivers and along the Battery betokened that something unusual was about to happen. Large crowds of people were seen hurrying to the docks for the purpose of embarking on vessels which were to convey them to the scene of the race. Women and children were especially numerous, and appeared to be as eager to see the yachts as their male relatives and friends. The majority of them presented a very respectable and genteel appearance, and it seemed as if the greater part of the middle and wealthy classes had, moved by a simultaneous impulse, turned out on the occasion, and had suddenly become warm patrons of the noble pastime, yachting. Almost everywhere throughout the City the spectator was certain to encounter hundreds of old men and young, girls and matrons, alone or in family parties, whose destination was the Lower Bay, and the ear was constantly greeted with remarks about the great race. The excitement even invaded the most aristocratic portions of the City, and private carriages, filled with fair and gaily-dressed inmates, were seen in large numbers on Fifth and Madison avenues, carrying their owners toward the river side. Wall-street was also stirred by the same enthusiasm, and was comparatively silent and deserted in the afternoon. Gold and stocks were almost forgotten for the nonce, and bets on the yachts and on the result were the principal events on 'Change. The banker and the merchant, the scholar and the public official were alike animated by the same feelings, and each abandoned his desk and duties in order to join in the general mass traveling seaward.

THE SCENE IN THE BAY.

The various yachts which were to compete in the race were nearly all anchored off the club-house of the New-York Yacht Club at Clifton, Staten Island, on Sunday night, and under way at an early hour yesterday morning, in readiness to take their respective places in line. As the time approached for the start the south-western extremity of Long Island and the Staten Island shore, familiarly known as the Narrows, commenced rapidly filling with vessels of every description. Here were gathered little pleasure vessels, such as sloops, sail-boats and small schooners, together with commodious and elegant steamers, densely crowded with passengers. Several fine steam yachts were also present, and music was furnished by five or six bands stationed on different boats. The large steamers which were assembled at the starting point did not number less than thirty, and were all gaily decorated with flags. The banks on Staten Island were fairly alive with human beings, who extended in a solid row from Vanderbilt's Landing, just above the Club-house, all the way to Fort Richmond. The parapets of the latter structure offered a good opportunity for viewing the start and the return of the racers, and were well crowded with spectators. The number of people who witnessed the race was estimated at fully 50,000. Old mariners and harbor boatmen declared that such a sight and such a multitude had never been seen in New-York Bay before.

STATIONING THE YACHTS.

Just below Vanderbilt's Landing, near the Long Island shore, was anchored a medium-sized pleasure sloop named the Imogene. This was placed there to serve as a stake-boat. At about 8 o'clock the yachts commenced taking positions inside of this sloop, from east to west, preparatory to receiving the signal to start. The renowned Cambria was one of the first to go into line. Her owner was allowed the choice of position, and selected the one nearest in shore on the Staten Island side. At the time he did so a stiff breeze was blowing from the west, which made the spot where his yacht lay the most advantageous one along the entire line. The wind veered to the south-east before the start, however, obliging the sailing-master of the Cambria to make a short port tack after getting under way. This made a loss of nearly a mile for the Cambria. The task of assigning places to the yachts was performed by Capt. SIDNEY DORLON, the veteran oysterman, who has officiated at the regattas of the New-York Yacht Club for several years. The line extended nearly across the Bay, and was composed of eighteen schooner yachts, the distance between each being about 100 feet. They were all trimmed nicely, and were arranged with their bows pointing toward the Battery. Their canvas was on deck, and they lay entirely motionless for a very few minutes. They each looked, with their naked masts and long hulls sitting low in the water, "as idle as a painted ship upon a painted ocean." The signal-guns were fired for the start, and almost instantaneously with the reports the quite appearance of the yachts was succeeded by bustle and activity on board. Sails were set in rapid succession, and the sailors moved about with alacrity. In a few seconds each yacht had got under way, and had put about in the direction of the course. The scene was a beautiful one, and held the eyes of every one in wrapt admiration. The yachts were all quickly on their way out to sea before many minutes had elapsed.

The following are the names of some of the steamers who attended the race:

Plymouth Rock, Gen. Sedgwick, Norwalk, Magenta, Middletown, Seth Low, Granite State, Pope Catlin, Pleasant Valley, Virginia Seymour, Tillie, Naushon, Sylvan Grove, Winona, A. Fletcher, D. R. Martin, Neversink, Minnahannock, Henry Smith and Florence.

The distance sailed by the yachts from the time of starting to the finish of the race was about forty miles.

The following yachts were entered but did not take part in the race: The Palmer, Fleur de Lis, Eva, Restless, Josephine, Jessie and Vesta.

As the vessels lay at the anchorage ground opposite the house of the New-York Yacht Club, they were in the following order, counting from the extreme outside: 1. Alarm; 2. Magic; 3. Calypso: 4. Silvie; 5. Widgeon; 6. Dauntless; 7. Tarolinta; 8. Halcyon; 9. Idler; 10. Rambler; 11. Phantom; 12. Fleetwing; 13. Madgie; 14. Madelline; 15. America; 16. Tidal Wave; 17. Cambria; 18. Alice.

At 11:16 A.M. the first gun was fired from the tug-boat P. Orary, on board of which were the judges, as a signal for the fleet to prepare for getting underway, and at 11:26—ten minutes afterward—the second gun was fired as the signal for starting. Immediately sails were hoisted, and the yachts began to swing round, and point their prows oceanward, the Magic being the first to go at about 11:27; the America second, at 11:28; the Phantom third, at 11:30; and the Dauntless and Madeleine at about the same time, 11:31; the others following in a few seconds thereafter. At 11:32 the whole fleet was under headway, and all eyes were directed upon it, attention being particularly directed toward the Dauntless, the America, and the Cambria. It was soon discovered that the Magic had the start of all her competitors, and was scudding along at a rapid rate before a stiff breeze which was blowing from the southeast. Before the whole fleet was properly under headway, in fact, the Magic had sailed quite a distance and soon made her first starboard tack. The Cambria had at this time crowded on her canvass and appeared to excellent advantage. The Phantom, Idler and Tidal Wave were hard after the Magic, after making their tack, but the last-named vessel seemed to be endowed with life, and after tacking again she opened a wide gap between herself and her competitors which was increased as time progressed. The America now became the point at which all eyes were directed. The peculiar rake of her masts made her easily distinguishable from all the others, and it was observed that she, although having no top-sails set, was "walking away" from the Cambria, which vessel was soon after the start immediately in her wake, but she was also gaining on the Magic and working her way to the front with remarkable rapidity. The excellent manner in which she was sailed was universally commented upon, and as she kept on her course and apparently continued to gain on the Magic, high hopes were entertained that she might be the winner of the race. The Dauntless now began to feel the effects of the breeze, which had freshened somewhat, and laid down to her work nobly. She carried only one topsail, seemed to scud along very comfortably, without spreading all her sail, though most of the fleet had put up every inch of canvass. The Phantom, Idler, Madgie and Silvie were next in order, and their relative positions were only slightly altered when they reached the buoy at the South-west Spit. This point was reached in the following order and time:

	H.	M.	S.
1. Magic	2	48	0
2. America	2	53	55
3. Idler	2	53	45
4. Silvie	2	56	0
5. Phantom	2	56	15
6. Dauntless	2	56	20
7. Madgie	2	59	0
8. Tidal Wave	3	0	45
9. Calypso	3	2	10
10. Halcyon	3	2	10
11. Fleetwing	3	4	05
12. Madeleine	3	6	30
13. Cambria	3	7	0
14. Widgeon	3	7	30
14. Tarolinta	3	7	55
16. Alarm	3	8	30
17. Alice	3	10	0
18. Rambler	3	10	30

On nearing the Spit buoy the America sent down her balloon jib, and after passing it sent up her foretopsail, which, until this time, was not spread. As will be seen from the above table, the America had behaved most nobly up to this point, there being but four minutes and fifty-five seconds of time difference between her passing the buoy and the passage of the Magic by the same point. When the Cambria came up, the hand on board one of the steamers which accompanied the fleet down the bay struck up "God Save the Queen," and though she was thirteenth in the race, she was greeted with loud cheers, the screeching of steam whistles and other manifestations of good feeling. When the America neared the Spit buoy, the judges and others who were on board the steamer Seth Low, which lay very near the buoy, could hardly realize that it was she; but as she approached nearer and nearer it was reduced to a certainty that the swift scudding craft was none other than she, and immediately cheers were sent up from all the steamers in the vicinity, guns were fired, and the bands struck up "Yankee Doodle." That she had gained so much on the leading yacht, (the tonnage of which it will be remarked is only 97 tons and a fraction, while that of the America is over 178 tons) showed not only the splendid sailing qualities of the vessel, but also the admirable manner in which she was handled by Capt. BROWN, Jr., whose father sailed this same yacht when she, in British waters, showed a clean pair of heels to every vessel in the Royal Thames Yacht Club, and brought in triumph to our shores the famous Queen's Cup prize.

When all had passed the Spit buoy, the scene, as the white-winged racers sped onward toward the light-ship, was superb. The small sailing craft, shallops and sloops and small tugs that up to this time had accompanied the fleet, and dotted the Bay far and wide, retraced their course toward the anchorage ground, or put in under cover of the land to await the fleets' return, and the wide expanse of water was left almost entirely to the racers and the larger steamers. Onward they sped toward the open ocean. Two of the Judges, Messrs. MOSES H. GRINNELL and ALEXANDER HAMILTON, Jr., here left the Seth Low, and being put on board the steamer Middletown, the club-boat for the day, went down to the light-ship to note the order in which the racers rounded that point. Here they remained until seven of them made the turn, when they went to the anchorage ground off Staten Island, to be present at the finish of the homestretch when the yachts passed the stake-boat.

The order and time in which the first seven rounded the light-ship was as follows:

	H.	M.	S.
1. Magic	2	8	59
2. Idler	2	13	16
3. Dauntless	2	14	15
4. America	2	15	0
5. Phantom	2	19	59
6. Madgie	2	21	14
7. Silvie	2	23	16

The Dauntless passed this same point at 2:27:19. On the run from the Spit buoy to the light-ship the Dauntless showed her qualities admirably. She began to crowd the America, and on making the last tack before rounding managed to head her a very short distance, and in consequence of this gain went round the ship just one minute and ten seconds ahead of her. This advantage she continued to hold and gain upon during the residue of the race, as will be seen by the table below. As the judges, who remained on board the Seth Low had to take the time at the Spit buoy on the return, all haste was made to reach that point, and this steamer, on which were the representatives of the Press, soon reached the buoy, and took a position quite near it, awaiting the arrival of the racers.

While making this stretch occurred one of the most exciting scenes of the whole race. The Magic was speeding along at a faster rate than ever, when the Josephine, Mr. B. M. C. DURFEE's yacht, which had been entered for but did not start in the race, and which was sailing around merely for pleasure purposes, rounded to, and seemed anxious to "give the Magic a brush." The yachts were nearly side by side, both having all their canvass spread, and a trial of their relative speed was forthwith entered into. It seemed as if the Magic had enough to do to prevent the Josephine from passing her, but she bravely scudded along, and as her competitor showed increased determination to pass her, she fairly put her scuppers under water as she "laid down to her work," and made the most of every particle of the breeze that she could catch, and held every inch of her headway. The Josephine kept up the contest for about ten minutes, when, seeing that the chance of passing her antagonist was hopeless, she tacked and drew out of the contest. After leaving the light-ship, and when midway between that and the buoy at the South-west Spit, the Cambria met with an accident. A very stiff breeze was blowing and the Britisher had all sail set when suddenly her foretopmast gave way and sent the foretopsail overboard. A small spare staysail was soon rigged between the two masts, however, and under this she sped along quite lively, so much so that on passing the Spit buoy in her disabled condition she was highly complimented by the judges and others on board the Seth Low. How, in fact, she could have rigged up the stay-sail in the short space of time she had to do it in was a matter of wonder. However, notwithstanding the accident, she appeared to good advantage. The Tidal Wave was not in trim as she passed the Spit, having in some way fouled her maintopsail in attempting to lower it. The Widgeon, for some reason or other, instead of passing the buoy, made a tack and stood off through the Swash Channel, thus putting herself out of the race altogether. The time at and the order in which the yachts severally passed the judges' boat at the buoy, in returning, were as follows:

	H.	M.	S.
1. Magic	2	48	55
2. Dauntless	2	51	0
3. Idler	2	52	0
4. America	2	2	5
5. Sylvie	3	7	20
6. Phantom	3	8	10
7. Madgie	3	8	40
8. Cambria	3	12	0
9. Fleetwing	3	14	0
10. Halcyon	3	16	10
11. Tidal Wave	3	22	15
12. Tarolinta	3	24	0
13. Calypso	3	25	30
14. Madeleine	3	28	0
15. Alice	3	29	40
16. Rambler	3	31	55
17. Alarm—drew out—no time taken.

The homestretch from this point to the stake-boat anchored off the Club-house, Staten Island, did not vary the position of the yachts to a very great extent. The wind died away partially and the run to the stake-boat was not made, in consequence, as expeditiously, especially by the larger craft, as it would have been had as stiff a breeze aided their return as greeted them on setting out from the anchorage. The return was made in the following time and order—time allowances being reckoned—the Magic being the first in, and winning the race in 3 hours, 58 minutes and 21 seconds:

	STAKE-BOAT. H.	M.	S.	TIME OF RACE. H.	M.	S.
1. Magic	3	33	54	3	58	21
2. Dauntless	3	35	27	4	29	23

The Williamsburg Tragedy — Coroner's Inquest.

The inquest on the body of ANDREW MURPHY, who was stabbed on Friday evening last, in the yard of his late residence, No. 207 North Eighth-street, was continued before Coroner WHITEHILL, yesterday afternoon, in the rooms of the Fourth District Court.

CATHARINE MAGUIRE, residing in the same building with the deceased and the prisoner, testified that on the night previous to the unfortunate occurrence there appeared to be a feeling between the parties regarding the children of both, but she heard no threats used.

MR. MAXAMILIAN H. SHUBER, testified to dressing a wound on the right side of the prisoner's mouth, and was informed by him that it was occasioned by a bite.

MRS. MARY MURPHY, wife of the deceased, deposed to that of the prisoner and his wife of late having indulged in drink, and that she had told them on Thursday evening to move from the premises. On the evening of the fatal occurrence she said her husband was engaged in repairing the roof of the house; saw the prisoner go and obtain a glass of liquor, and commence to abuse her husband from the window; after taking supper the deceased went into the yard, the prisoner shortly after followed, and kicked a dog belonging to the deceased, which was not in his way. A scuffle then ensued between the parties, and in the endeavor to separate them she was cut between the fingers by a knife in the hand of THOMAS MURPHY, who said, "you held me," and made a plunge with the knife at her, and struck her across the jaw, leaving marks of blood from his hand. The men were then separated by Mr. FANNING. He husband was taken in the house, when he exclaimed, "I am done for; I am stabbed."

Dr. JOSEPH CREAMER, being sworn, said that he examined the body of ANDREW MURPHY, found at No. 207 North Eighth-street; there were two wounds on the upper portion of the left hip, and one on the left breast, about an inch below the nipple, which, upon examination, was found to have penetrated the cavity of the chest to the pericardium and left ventricle of the heart; this wound caused the death of the deceased; the other two wounds were merely through the muscular tissue; all the woudds were inflicted by some sharp instrument, such as an ordinary pocket-knife.

The Coroner then charged the jury, who retired, and after about half an hour returned the following verdict: "That the deceased, ANDREW MURPHY, came to his death from the effects of a stab wound inflicted by THOMAS MURPHY, on the evening of Friday, Aug. 5, 1870, at No. 207 North Eighth-street, Williamsburg."

The prisoner, in answer to the question of the Coroner, stated his occupation to be that of a mason, aged forty-nine years; and pleaded to the charge, "Not guilty." He was then committed to await the action of the Grand Jury.
